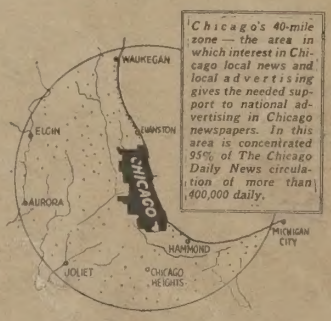
8 p.m. in the Market



IT makes a world of difference to you, as a national advertiser, whether or not your message is in a medium wanted for its advertising when the calm of evening settles upon the household.

Relatively few are likely to buy a newspaper to read your particular advertising. But many will demand it for the local advertising it contains. This very human interest in the advertising of the local stores is easily turned to your advantage by placing your advertising in the same medium.

The local advertiser selects the newspaper that is richest in its home-reading qualities and makes it, with his advertising, a doubly effective medium for the national advertiser, because the latter shares in a very definite advertising reader-interest.

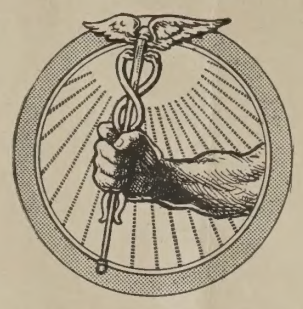
Thus the national advertiser is enabled to confine his expenditure to the profitable market, assured that both as to its area and its constituency it is the field he can successfully cultivate.

Chicago's 40-mile zone — the area in which interest in Chicago local news and local advertising gives the needed support to national advertising in Chicago newspapers. In this area is concentrated 95% of The Chicago Daily News circulation of more than 400,000 daily.

CHICAGO MARKET FACTS

Woman's buying and the great influence she exerts upon all buying are recognized in Chicago as one of the fundamental characteristics of the market.

Recognized as fundamental, too, is the preference of Chicago women for The Daily News, reflected in The Daily News leadership in typical advertising classifications—department stores, groceries, household utilities.



Chicago women find the advertising in The Daily News a comprehensive guide to whatever is advertised for sale in Chicago—and they insist upon getting this all-important information in the paper they read at home in the evening. An advertiser seeking to establish selling influence with Chicago women needs only a little acquaintance with the Chicago market and a knowledge of the practice of Chicago advertisers to know that his right medium is The Daily News.

No Advertising Experiments

A YEAR of sharp competition for business, 1927 is no year for experiments with your advertising appropriation. Advertisers do not experiment in buying space in The New York Times.

Results, and the fundamental values of an advertising medium, have established The Times, year after year, as the first choice in the New York market among national and local advertisers.

The largest volume of quality circulation in the richest market—intelligent, thinking readers with confidence in its advertising columns which its censorship continually strengthens—typographical standards for the protection of advertisers—a circulation not gained by premiums or forcing, and growing steadily.

Net paid sale, daily 370,000; Sundays 650,000.

Two Kinds of Slaps

¶ There's the friendly slap on the back expressing whole-hearted approval. And there's the downright slap which means something entirely different.

¶ The Sunpapers get both—and usually give more generous space to the venomous variety.

¶ The truest index to reader interest is the mail-bag containing letters "To the Editor"—and that portion of the Sunpapers' mail is unusually heavy.

¶ Lots of Baltimoreans disagree with the Sunpapers—argue with the Sunpapers—battle with the Sunpapers.

¶ But—and you can't get away from this—they read the Sunpapers just as faithfully and regularly as the Baltimoreans who approve Sunpaper policies.

¶ To keep in touch with the offerings of their local merchants, Baltimoreans must read the Sunpapers. And to get in touch with Baltimoreans—you must use the Sunpapers!

Newspaper Circulations Wing Skyward As Lindbergh Spans Atlantic

Greatest Peace-Time Story of Modern Journalism Found Presses Unable to Meet Stupendous Call for Saturday and Sunday Editions—N. Y. Times Gives Aviator All Proceeds from Sale of His Story

CIRCULATION figures soared on airplane wings this week as newspapers chronicled the exploit of the daring Capt. Charles A. Lindbergh, and the honors heaped upon the New York-to-Paris flyer by France.

Some newspaper men called the thrilling adventure "the biggest story since the war." Certainly it gripped the imagination of the American public to such an extent that newspaper presses could not work fast enough to meet the demand.

There wasn't a newspaper in New York that could fill its orders, and all the papers, without the Lindbergh story, would have felt a drop last Sunday, since the in-between season slump was due.

Reports similar to this were received by EDITOR & PUBLISHER from newspapers in all sections of the nation, and how sales climbed skyward with the Lindbergh news is told in these dispatches, published elsewhere in this story.

One of the most interesting newspaper angles in connection with the exploitation of the story was the generosity of the New York Times, purchaser of the exclusive newspaper rights to Capt. Lindbergh's own signed account of his trans-Atlantic adventure. In addition to paying the full contract price for the outstanding feature, the New York Times turned over to the young aviator all the profits obtained from selling it at substantial rates to 30 newspapers covering all sections of the country.

This action on the part of the Times was revealed to EDITOR & PUBLISHER by E. Lansing Ray, publisher of the St. Louis Globe-Democrat, one of the purchasers of the story. Mr. Ray said that the Times had notified him, after the young captain's triumph, of the plan to give to Lindbergh all the money received for the story.

"It was a graceful gesture on the part of the Times to the courage and skill of Capt. Lindbergh," Mr. Ray said.

Mr. Ray declared he understood the Times paid Capt. Lindbergh a little under $10,000 for the exclusive newspaper rights here and abroad, and "made in addition many thousands of dollars for the intrepid airman, which were immediately deposited to his credit in Paris."

The publisher of the St. Louis Globe-Democrat was himself one of the underwriters of the flight of the Spirit of St. Louis.

Other than confirming what Mr. Ray had said, no one on the Times would be quoted regarding the generous act, probably unparalleled in all journalistic history.

Saturday evening newspapers got the big break on the general news story, ably handled by press associations and specials, but one of the amazing features of the story was the way it continued to sell increased orders of papers both morning and evening up until Wednesday afternoon of this week, when, according to reports received by EDITOR & PUBLISHER, the sale began to fall off.

On the afternoon of Saturday presses were kept dressed ready for the cabled flash from Le Bourget field near Paris. For every correct report of the airman's progress across the Atlantic to Ireland, across the Channel to France and from Cherbourg to Paris, there were at least three false reports, press association men informed EDITOR & PUBLISHER. Some papers did get away before noon on Saturday with a false report of Lindbergh's arrival in Paris which had to be corrected later.

Only the Commercial Cable Company had a direct telephone wire to Le Bourget field. There were no telegraph arrangements there, such as there would have been in America. The flash when it finally came was via Commercial.

But before it came, Captain Lindbergh caused breathless excitement in many a newspaper office. He circled the field and went back toward Paris before returning to land safely at last.

Shortly after five o'clock the first cable flash at preferred rates reached New York. It read:

"Plane believed to be Lindbergh's seen approaching Le Bourget."

The next flash, more than 20 agonizing minutes later, was:

"Lindbergh coming down."

Then at 5.24: "Lindbergh landed safely."

It was this last flash that started circulations toward their high altitude records.

Newspaper men varied in their estimates of the circulation value of the story. William P. Beazell, assistant managing editor of the New York World, classed it as the biggest since the armistice. Charles Flanagan, circulation manager of the New York Times, dug up the records to show that Gov. Alfred E. Smith's election last November sold 10,000 more papers on a single day than the Lindbergh story. In Minneapolis newspaper men agreed it brought the biggest sale of papers "since the Dempsey-Tunney fight."

In Lincoln, Neb., where the Captain learned to fly, the arrival in France boosted newspaper sales 300 per cent.

A check of the space given to the story has been made by Walter Hyams & Co., a New York clipping service, which on Monday announced that since quitting San Diego, Cal., two weeks before, Capt. Lindbergh's exploits and personality have used more than 27,000 columns of newspaper space. This was said to exceed by 220,000 clippings the space given to the death of President Woodrow Wilson, a previous high record for peace-time news.

A very few minutes after the flash Saturday, New York evening papers were on the street. The Evening World increased its sale by 114,000, Foster Gilroy, promotion manager, announced. Tom Dowling, circulation director of the New York Evening Telegram, said the Telegram kept its presses running until 9 o'clock Saturday evening and sold 380,000. This was 100,000 ahead of a previous high record obtained at the time of the Snyder-Gray verdict. The New York Evening Journal, which issued an early extra based on a false report, sold over 900,000 copies, according to Joseph Bannon.

The New York Sun, Edwin S. Friendly, business manager, said, sold every copy it could print, and the same report came from the New York Evening Graphic. The Evening Post chalked up a new high record for its Saturday sale, A. Newman, circulation manager, announced.

All Sunday newspapers were limited in their sales by the number of gravure and comic sections already printed. Mr. Flanagan, on the New York Times, however, ordered more of these special sections printed on Saturday morning, and the Sunday Times sold 669,000 copies. More could have been sold had the supply of special sections been larger.

"On Monday the sales were approximately 419,000," Mr. Flanagan continued; "on Tuesday it went even higher, mounting to 422,000, while on Wednesday the decline started and the figure was approximately 412,000.

"These figures are approximately 35,000 to 40,000 over the same days last year. Our high record for daily sales was when Gov. Smith was elected. It was 432,000.

"We had calls as late as 9 o'clock Sunday evening for copies of the paper. Orders from dealers which we were unable to fill mounted to more than 10,000.

"On Monday we heard reports from some sections of the city that people were so anxious to read Lindbergh's own story that they offered $1 a copy for the Times. One news dealer, we learned, solved the problem of the shortage by renting copies of the Times, instead of selling them."

Mr. Beazell said the Sunday World was a complete sell-out, declaring that approximately 620,000 copies were sold. On Monday, he said, the sale was 68,000 ahead of the same day last year and on Tuesday it was 53,000 ahead.

Porter Caruthers, assistant business manager of the New York Herald Tribune, said his paper's circulation on Sunday jumped up 50,000 and orders for nearly 10,000 more had to be refused.

"News will always sell a newspaper above all other features, fads, fancies and special columns," said Louis F. Gautier, circulation manager of the New York Morning Telegraph. "With Lindbergh news the Morning Telegraph sold out its entire edition and could have sold 10,000 more copies."

Reports from other cities as gathered by telegraph by EDITOR & PUBLISHER also indicated unusually heavy sales.

In Springfield, Mass., to meet the demand on Sunday the Union and Republican sold copies without the extra rotogravure and comic sections, explaining the omission with a front page box reading: "If Some of Your Paper is Missing it is Because Lindbergh Flew to Paris." After explaining the situation the paper said: "The Union and Republican regrets the loss of these features to its readers, but feels that the story of Lindbergh's great flight more than makes up for any disappointment which may have been caused."

The Washington Star reported 16,000 increased sales Saturday, and the Post

REAY AND BERTOLET HEAD GROUP WHICH BUYS ST. PAUL NEWS

Executives of Daily Including Kahn, Neal, Thompson and Stein Acquire Paper from Clover Leaf Group—Associated With Paper Since 1900

CONTROL of the St. Paul Daily News passed, May 20, to N. W. Reay, publisher, and C. D. Bertolet, manager, of the paper's national advertising department.

N. W. Reay

Mr. Reay and Mr. Bertolet acquired the stock formerly held by Mrs. Mary McCurdy Ashbaugh, widow of the founder.

Associated with them in the purchase are Howard Kahn, editor; W. H. Neal, business manager; M. W. Thompson, advertising manager, and C. J. Stein, secretary and treasurer.

Howard Kahn

Mr. Reay and Mr. Bertolet will continue in active charge of the paper. Both have been active in its management since its establishment in 1900. They have controlled its policies since the death of Mr. Ashbaugh four years ago.

Negotiations for the transfer of the property were concluded by cable. Mrs. Ashbaugh is traveling in Europe.

"I am particularly glad to have the property come under the control of Mr. Reay and Mr. Bertolet," Mrs. Ashbaugh cabled. "By the transfer of the stock they realized their life's ambition.

"I feel that St. Paul benefits because it insures permanent control by those who succesfully built the property with my husband rather than by strangers unacquainted with the city's problems."

The sale includes in addition to the Daily News the Cloverleaf Weekly and the Cloverleaf American, published in tabloid form. These weeklies have a large circulation in the northwest.

The Daily News was established March 1, 1900, by L. V. Ashbaugh, Mr. Reay and Mr. Bertolet. Up to the present time the two latter have been the largest minority stockholders.

The new owners contemplate no changes in policy or staff. The Daily News today has one of the most modern newspaper plants in the northwest, with 316 office employes and equipment and real estate valued at more than $600,000.

Mr. Reay and Mr. Bertolet in a statement promised to continue the ideals which Mr. Ashbaugh stated when the first issue emerged—an ideal of service to the nation, to the northwest and to St. Paul and a definite policy of honesty and fairness, with uncompromising opposition to every form of graft, vice and crookedness.

Mr. Bertolet is a graduate of Northwestern University, Evanston, Ill. His first position was with the Lord & Thomas advertising agency, Chicago. He later was connected with the Chicago Journal.

At the time Mr. Ashbaugh started the nucleus of the Cloverleaf Newspapers Mr. Bertolet associated himself with the foreign department in the capacity of Chicago representative. He later became manager of national advertising of all Cloverleaf newspapers.

From time to time he acquired stock in the various publications.

He has worked continuously for twenty-seven years in the national advertising department of the Cloverleaf papers.

Mr. Reay started his newspaper career in 1890 for the Scripps League on the Cincinnati Post, and worked with them until 1900. In 1900 with Mr. Ashbaugh he came to St. Paul and installed the plant of the St. Paul Daily News. His first position was bookkeeper. Later he was advanced to cashier, office manager and business manager, and at the death of Mr. Ashbaugh became president and publisher.

Mr. Kahn, Mr. Neal, Mr. Thompson, and Mr. Stein, have all been associated with the Daily News for a number of years and for the past several years have served in their present capacity.

S. G. LITTLE PROMOTED

S. G. Little, who for the past year has been national advertising manager of the Asheville (N. C.) Citizen, has been promoted to advertising manager, in charge of both local and national. C. R. McIntyre, former local manager, has resigned to go into the automobile business. McIntyre had been with the Citizen for the past 21 years. Little was at one time with the E. Katz Special Advertising Agency, New York, and was a junior partner with E. E. Wolcott, representing the Clover Leaf Newspapers.

300 FILM PROGRAMS

The number of film programs furnished by the Janesville (Wis.) Daily Gazette community department reached the 300 mark recently. The paper books films and supervises their showing at schools, clubs and before community groups. The plan has proved an excellent builder of good-will according to Stephen Bolles, editor.

LINDBERGH INVITED TO ATTEND S. N. P. A. MEET

CONGRATULATIONS and an invitation for Charles Lindbergh to be the honor guest of the Southern Newspaper Publishers' Association at its twenty-fifth annual convention July 4, at Atlanta, was received by Lindbergh, Sunday, in Paris, when he was handed a cablegram from A. G. Newmyer, associate publisher of the New Orleans Item.

Mr. Newmyer, who is past president of the S. N. P. A. and chairman of the 1927 convention program committee, wired the daring aviator as follows:

"Southern Newspaper Publishers' Association extends heartiest congratulations and invites you to be its honor guest at the twenty-fifth annual convention in Atlanta on July 4. Kindly cable.

"A. G. NEWMYER."

OCHS TELEGRAPHS PRAISE

Publisher of N. Y. Times Sees Lustre Added to America by Lindbergh

Adolph S. Ochs, publisher of the New York Times, who is on an automobile tour of France, telegraphed his congratulations to Capt. Charles A. Lindbergh from Biarritz to Paris on May 24. He wired:

"Present my heartiest congratulations to Charles Lindbergh on his epochal achievement and having won an imperishable name. The human race throughout the world proclaims him and takes pride in his daring and courage.

"He has added new lustre and renown to America and to its respect and prestige with all peoples. I wish I had been present to greet him."

WINS ART CLASS VOTE

The Tribune Tower, which houses the editorial and executive offices of the Chicago Tribune, was voted the most beautiful building in the city by a University of Chicago art class. Out of 50 votes cast, the Tower received 25 and the Field Museum was second with 5. The other votes were widely distributed, no other building receiving more than three.

NO MORE PROPAGANDA

An Editorial by C. E. Broughton, Editor, Sheboygan (Wis.) Press

THE World War has been charged with a great many grievances, imaginary and otherwise, but it is an indisputable fact that an unlimited number of days and weeks for fad observances have been handed down. Some are worthy of commemoration; others ought to have been canned long ago. We are giving a few of these today for the information of the reading public: Child Health day, Better Homes week, Canned Foods week, American Forest week, National Music week, Baby week, Fire Prevention week, Clean-up week, Better English week, Thrift week, January Laugh month, Girl Scout week, Boy Scout week, National Garden week, Golden Rule day, and World Good Will day, and at the present rate the year will not be sufficiently long to take care of all these and others to follow.

Now, we do not want to say that some of these observances are not meritorious, but there are a great number of organizations that use the newspaper to promote these observances without doing any work themselves. When they want to get some publicity they run over to the newspaper office and attempt to fill the columns, and in many instances they ask for editorials and then mail these in as the sum total of their work. This paper is willing to co-operate whenever it deems the effort worthwhile, but we are getting tired of being used as a propaganda sheet. During the World War we had meatless days, wheatless days, and any number of other days and weeks, but they were promulgated in the interest of winning the war, and newspapers willingly assumed the task of publicity mediums. The war is over now, and organizations that attempt to foster the numerous observances will do well to promote a program themselves that is worthwhile and not shirk their responsibilities. Let them work out a local program that is of appealing interest to the public, and they will find their local newspaper ready and willing to join with them.

We have been approached for the last three years and urged to run editorials furthering a certain movement, and the committee representing the organization, so far as we know, has not performed a single activity recommended in the bulletin sent out by the national organization.

The American people are tired of being fed this kind of propaganda, and the Sheboygan Press does not feel justified or warranted in filling its columns with material that does not hold the readers' attention.

FORD NAMES AYER TO HANDLE ADVERTISING

Philadelphia Agency to Place Copy on Cars, Trucks and Tractors—No Date Set for Start of Campaign

Edsel B. Ford has appointed N. W. Ayer & Son of New York and Philadelphia to handle the advertising of the Ford Motor Car Company, he notified EDITOR & PUBLISHER by telegraph on May 25.

Mr. Ford's announcement of the appointment coincided with a statement issued in Detroit of a new three-speed model, which officials asserted would be "superior in design and performance to any low-priced light car."

EDITOR & PUBLISHER on Thursday talked with Wilfred Frye, president of N. W. Ayer & Son, at Philadelphia headquarters over the long distance telephone.

Mr. Frye said it would "be difficult to predict" when first advertising copy would be placed describing the new model in paid space in the newspapers and magazines.

"We are not ready to make any announcement," he said. "The account will be an organization job. There will be several men in charge, but we have not yet decided who they will be."

Mr. Ford's telegram to EDITOR & PUBLISHER stated: "The Ford Motor Car Company announces that they have retained N. W. Ayer & Son of Philadelphia as advertising counsel to handle the Ford car, truck, and Fordson tractor."

The Ford Motor Car Company, according to estimates compiled by the Bureau of Advertising of the American Newspaper Publishers Association, reached its peak year as far as newspaper advertising appropriations were concerned in 1925 when $2,500,000 was expended in newspaper space.

The Bureau's estimates date back to 1923, when it was figured that Ford spent approximately $500,000 in newspapers. In 1924 he increased this sum to $2,400,000.

A big drop came in 1926, when, according to the estimates, the newspaper appropriation was only $400,000.

HOE OPENS COAST OFFICE

E. G. Beveridge Placed in Charge of New Branch—Crowther Resigns

R. Hoe & Co., Inc., has opened a San Francisco office in the Sharon Building, 55 Montgomery street, and Ernest G. Beveridge, who has been connected with the company in its service and sales departments for many years, has been placed in charge.

Fred Crowther, Western representative for 30 years and with headquarters in Los Angeles for the last 15 years, is retiring after having served the company for 42 years.

Previous to becoming Western representative, he was connected with the company's Chicago office. His resignation is effective June 1 and he is now traveling East on the way to Great Britain to visit his relatives.

TO FLY TO JAVA

Van Lear Black, president of the Baltimore Sun, who is now in London, has announced his intention of making an airplane trip from London to Java, in the Dutch East Indies. The return trip will also be made by air. He expects to leave Croydon, the London airport, in a Dutch airplane about June 11. A Dutch pilot and a reserve pilot will accompany Mr. Black.

PRINTING BILL PASSED

The Ohio legislature has passed over the veto of Governor A. V. Donahey a law compelling county auditors to publish their annual reports in the newspapers. The law had been unintentionally repealed by the previous legislature. The governor declared there was no necessity of publishing the reports in the papers.

"INSURANCE SHOULD BE BOUGHT, NOT SOLD"

Earnest Elmo Calkins, Noted Agency Man, Warns Insurance Firms Against Their "Destructive Silence"—"Insure Insurance," His Advice at Hartford Meeting

MEMBERS of the Insurance Advertising Conference in convention at Hartford, Conn., this week were advised to "insure insurance" by Earnest Elmo Calkins, president of Calkins & Holden, New York advertising agency.

His address, one of the highlights of the fifth annual meeting of the group, which opened Monday and closed Wednesday afternoon, was delivered Tuesday at luncheon. A. W. Spaulding, president of the Hartford Advertising Club, was toastmaster, and Winslow Russell, vice-president of the Phoenix Mutual Life Insurance Company, introduced the speaker.

Mr. Calkins said in part:

"Advertising men sometimes call advertising business insurance, and they wonder why insurance men who insure the world against everything that can happen do not insure insurance against the destructive power of silence.

"If advertising is business insurance, why do not the insurance companies advertise? A few do advertise, but their advertisements, while praiseworthy as samples, are too few and too small to form that body of insurance advertising which is necessary to create a new public opinion.

"In twelve leading magazines, as checked by the Curtis Publishing Company, the total expenditure for advertising insurance in 1926 was $1,064,269, while for the motor car and its accessories it was $30,955,298. The ratio for all advertising mediums would, if anything, increase the odds in favor of the auto. In proportion to its opportunity, insurance has never yet been advertised.

"Insurance has been sold all these years by an army of persistent, insistent, resourceful men. The large volume is due solely to their efforts, with no knowledge or intelligence on the part of the public to help them. Most of what the public suspects about insurance is wrong, including its suspicion that the agent is a nuisance.

"These agents are selling those priceless commodities—protection and peace of mind. In the words of old Omar to the vine-sellers:

"I often wonder what the vintner buys One-half so precious as the stuff he sells."

"I wonder also why insurance must be sold at all. Why should it not be bought? Why should a man have to be pursued to get him to buy insurance when he goes to the depot to buy a railroad ticket?

"There is no use in saying that he wants the trip and he does not want insurance. Frequently he does not want the trip. He may have to go on business, and since he has to go, he goes and hunts up the railroad and buys a ticket, but he waits for the agent to hunt him up and sell him the insurance he needs far more than he needs a trip.

"It is all in the way he has been taught. Some services are sold. Others are bought.

"If people really knew what insurance was, insurance agents could sit in their offices like nose and throat specialists and people would crowd their reception rooms for a chance to buy.

"They could press a button and ask the girl who has charge of the outer office, 'How many are waiting this morning, Miss Switchboard?' and when she says, 'Ten,' reply, 'Well, send them in in regular order.'

"Why should not people stand in line to buy insurance just as they stand in line to buy postage stamps? The answer is Habit. It is the habit for the insurance companies to chase prospects, and it is the habit of the travelers to chase ticket agents.

"A habit is the result of education, and one of the greatest forces in education is advertising. And advertising will reverse the process, so that the prospect pursues the agent, and insurance is sought and bought.

"A commodity sold is never sold quite so satisfactorily as a commodity bought. Insurance should have the advantages of active demand. The effort that is now devoted to selling it should be released to selling it right. It would place all insurance on a higher plane if we pictured it as a desirable club or exclusive organization into which we hoped to get, rather than as a group of annoying and persistent solicitors mailing us cards to ask when our birthday comes.

"Insurance means nothing to the average man but being bothered by an insurance agent or the regular payment of premiums, or a vague sheet of assets and liabilities. If insurance had been taught daily and weekly to all people who can read, in terms of living, in terms of man's daily interests and dreams and ambitions and affections, one of the basic things of life, like getting on in the world, or marriage, or health, or recreation, and especially if all the picturesque and entertaining stories which grow up around the practice of insurance were used, the sight of the word 'insurance' in print would be the signal for such interesting and agreeable mental pictures as the words 'raise in salary', 'home run' or 'tax reduction'.

"There are a few things that are absolutely basic in us, resting on natural and primitive instincts.

"Self preservation and self perpetuation have always been considered two of the greatest.

"Self preservation includes everything from a pay envelope to dodging an automobile.

"Another human instinct out of which insurance grows is co-operation. Co-operation is the finest flower of civilization. When hundred of thousands of people are washed out of their homes by the overflowing Mississippi the nation passes the hat and responds with millions to care for the refugees. This is spontaneous co-operation. But if every one of the dwellers in the lowlands bordering the Mississippi had been for years paying a small sum annually to insurance companies to provide against losses by flood, that would have been organized co-operation. Insurance is organized co-operation. It is a form of public utility.

"The time will come when the full power of advertising will be used to promote insurance. I may not live to see it, but perhaps you will. I mean promotive and creative advertising comparable in size and scope and persistence to that used to sell Liberty Bonds. The advertising was big enough to produce a state of mind, and for the time being no subject was more earnestly discussed. True, it had the background of a world war, but also it had little time, while insurance has all eternity to work up that state of mind. If insurance men appreciated the intrinsic human interest of what they sell, insurance would be a topic of conversation ranking with baseball, prohibition, radio or organized sport. I say this not because I believe in advertising, but because I believe in insurance.

"By the power of advertising, paid advertising, supplemented by the collateral advertising that an immense paid advertising venture would produce, insurance would have the breathless interest of a sex murder or a prize fight. For every million dollars spent in advertising insurance of all kinds, life, fire, accident, etc., thirty million is spent in advertising motor cars. Yet the motor car has no advantage over insurance in appeal, human interest, potential market, salability or importance to the human race. A company formed to manufacture a new motor car considers advertising as necessary as a factory. Insurance companies, with a few exceptions, have no conception of advertising.

"The time will come when insurance will be the most widely advertised commodity, but not until the present boards of control have passed away, and newer, younger men, who have grown up in a modern environment, have succeeded them. Banks and trust companies have begun to realize that they are human institutions as well as financial institutions, but insurance companies have never outgrown the actuarial conception of insurance.

The great force in advertising is group advertising, not co-operative, except as all advertising for any one industry is co-operative. It is the whole body of automobile advertising that keeps the motor car idea alive. Insurance has no such body of advertising. The few exceptions are but a drop in the bucket.

"Life insurance has made its greatest gain in recent years in group insurance. Let them apply the same reasoning to their own business until every company contributes its share toward making insurance the best known, the most talked about, the most interesting topic of our daily lives. A hundred campaigns as good as Metropolitan or Hartford Fire would do that very thing.

"With such a body of publicity, insurance would crop up in the news like baseball, radio or aviation. Nearly every great news story has its insurance slant, the Sherry-Netherland fire, the Snyder murder, the trans-Atlantic flight. The insurance slant is not stressed in the news because the topic is of no interest to the public. The insurance companies confirm this by their destructive silence."

Earnest Elmo Calkins

"Advertising is business insurance, why do not the insurance companies advertise?"

"If people really knew what insurance was, insurance agents could sit in their offices like nose and throat specialists and people would crowd their reception rooms for a chance to buy."

"The men who insure the world against everything that can happen do not insure insurance against the destructive power of silence."

The annual banquet of the Insurance Advertising Conference was held on Wednesday. C. M. Cartwright of Chicago, Ill., editor of the National Underwriter, was toastmaster. H. A. Calahan of New York, advertising counselor, and W. W. Darrow, advertising manager of the Home Insurance Company, were speakers.

In an address yesterday afternoon at the general meeting, Frank W. Pennell of the Life Insurance Associates of New York city questioned most of the high-powered methods of selling insurance, predicting that there would be an early return to some of the old-fashioned, unobtrusive and quiet methods that mark the work of the men who year in and year out swing the big production in the business.

Mr. Pennell discussed the qualities of a good insurance salesman, indicating that in his opinion the man who had been trained in a newspaper office made the best salesman because, Mr. Pennell said, "They inquire. They investigate. They dig up facts about others. They uncover situations. They eliminate the unfit fro mthe fit. They know the motives that induce men to buy insurance at a certain time."

Mr. Pennell urged that salesmen "get away from so much talk of contract and of cost and get across to their people the great idea of the service to which they are entitled, and which they certainly will enjoy if they make as careful a selection of their agent of record as they do of the company which is to have the contract."

C. W. Van Beynum, publicity manager of the Travelers Insurance company, spoke on "Checking Home Office Plans in the Field." He pointed out that home office officials should understand thoroughly the methods of each individual agent under their control and that the only way to accurately understand the field agent's problems was to live and work with them. Mr. Van Beynum said that in recent years oral salesmanship had been highly developed. He indicated that today particular emphasis should be laid on the emotional appeal of picture advertising.

Frederick L. Wertz, window display expert of New York City, discussed various phases of window display methods, indicating that with the proper treatment agents could profit considerably by use of this method. He said that the window display had a greater educational value than any form of advertising.

A. W. Spaulding presented his address in the novel form of a dialogue with questions and answers. Important matters of interest to those connected with advertising were excellently brought out in this manner.

R. W. Smiley, advertising manager of the Metropolitan Casualty company of New York, and Dale D. Butler of Middletown each discussed technicel matters relating to the advertisng of the insurance business.

ADVERTISERS' ASSOCIATION OBJECTS TO DAILY'S CIRCULATION CONTEST

Arthur Ogle, Secretary of A. N. A., Writes Newspaper Publisher to Tell Him That Space Buyers "Look Askance at Premium Circulation"—He Replies

EVIDENCE that the Association of National Advertisers intends to carry an active campaign against "forced" newspaper circulations was forthcoming this week, when Arthur H. Ogle, secretary and treasurer, issued for publication correspondence he has carried on with the publisher of an unnamed eastern daily newspaper objecting to a circulation contest it was conducting.

ARTHUR H. OGLE

Mr. Ogle said an A. N. A. member sent in an advertisement of the contest which the newspaper was publishing in its own space. The prizes included a $5,000 home and five automobiles, in addition to numerous smaller cash awards. Among statements objected to in the advertisement was the following:

"THE WORLD IS YOUR FIELD.

"You can work anywhere. You need not confine yourself to any town, county, city or state. Get subscriptions wherever you can get them. Districts have no meaning in the matter of getting subscriptions. Go anywhere.

"Go quickly. Remember, some other worker may beat you to it, so get into the contest at once and get that subscription, wherever it may be."

Mr. Ogle's letter to the publisher, clearly setting forth the A. N. A.'s attitude and inviting friendly discussion, follows:

"Dear Sir:

"One of our members, who is an important national advertiser, has brought to our attention a circulation contest which you are conducting, the details of which were given in a full-page advertisement in your issue of April —. In connection with this it has occurred to me that you would be interested in knowing the attitude of members of the Association of National Advertisers toward premium circulation, and toward the extension of circulation beyond the normal trading area of the newspaper.

"It is undoubtedly true that in the past many advertisers have insistently demanded mass circulation without much questioning as to who the newspaper's readers were, where they lived and how carefully they read it, but it is also evident that those national advertisers who in the past have bought on the basis of quality only are now interested in knowing about quality and location of circulation, as well as about reader interest. Obviously, therefore, they are likely to look askance at premium circulation, particularly when the prizes are of such great value as those offered by your publication.

"In addition to the question of quality of circulation and reader interest, one of the subjects of greatest interest to the advertiser is that of the distribution of circulation with respect to the normal local trading area of the city in which the newspaper is published. National advertisers use newspapers to enable them to localize their advertising, and circulation which goes far beyond the local trading area is largely wasted. Therefore, it was rather a shock to read that part of your advertisement entitled 'The World Is Your Field,' in which you urge your subscription workers to get subscribers in any county, city or state they desire.

"As you no doubt know, our interest in newspapers, or in any other medium, is based entirely on our desire to assist in making advertising more effective and to get the advertiser more in results for each dollar he spends. Obviously, the publishers are just as much interested in the subject of economical advertising as are the advertisers themselves, and it is for that reason that I take the liberty of bringing these matters to your attention. I would appreciate some expression from you when you've had an opportunity to give these subjects consideration."

To this letter the publisher replied on May 24 that he was opposed to the use of premiums and "scarcely ever" used them. He welcomed Mr. Ogle's letter, he said, "particularly at this time, when it seems that newspapers all about have gone wild in their attempts to build circulation figures." He continued:

"Our circulation contests are run in self defense and would never be run at all did we not feel compelled to use them to checkmate contests previously announced by our competitor. We have never employed a contest company of any kind, but conducted these ourselves with our regular organization, so we are in a position to know they are conducted honorably and we are always here to back up what is done when the contest is over."

In a statement to EDITOR & PUBLISHER, Mr. Ogle said that the following factors were those emphasized by the A. N. A. in its program dealing with newspaper circulation:

"First, our entire interest is to enable the advertiser to buy circulation which represents a maximum degree of profitableness to him. This implies concentration in local trading areas, sound character of readers, and a sustained reader interest.

"Second, since these are essential factors bearing on the economical expenditure of advertising appropriations, we feel sure that all forward-looking publishers are just as much interested in them as we are.

"Third, our entire effort in promoting our program is made in the belief that it should be a co-operative enterprise on the part of publishers and advertisers to insure greater return for the advertising dollar."

"SEXY" INTEREST GIVING WAY TO ROMANCE

Reading Public Swinging from Neurotic to More Healthy Subjects, Woman Editor Finds—Skeptical Readers Rejecting Fake Features and Demanding Facts

By PHILIP SCHUYLER

NEWSPAPER reading habits are undergoing a vast change, according to a shrewd observer of what the public wants, Mrs. William Brown Meloney, editor of the Sunday Magazine of the New York Herald Tribune. Her conclusion is not mere casual observation; it is based on her own tried, if secret, methods of surveying the immediate literary tastes of the fickle American public, and a theory she is now trying to develop which applies the cycle principle to general reader-interest values.

Briefly stated, the theory is that reading interests move in cycles corresponding to the pre-war and post-war periods of human history. People are brutally awakened to realism by a bloody war, into which they have been led by a taste for sentimentality and gaudily painted lies. The realism leads to a high peak of neurotic sex interest which fades off gradually into romance and next back to stupefying sentimentality.

"Up until 15 years ago, or just before the War, Americans were in a nodding, half-asleep state as far as their taste for reading was concerned," Mrs. Meloney said.

"Now they have reached a noon-tide of interest. They want to see things in bright lights, without shadows. People are wide awake. While they may not be doing a good job, at least they are right on the job.

"They want to be told the truth, today. The days of the half-faked and half-baked Sunday feature of the mysterious emerald and the woes it has visited on its owners through the ages or some similar story is no more, thank goodness.

"There's a healthy, wholesome skepticism at large generally that's very refreshing.

"Another thing people want to be told what its all about quickly, they want the news and features in the newspapers written with as few words as possible. Our American reading public today has no time for Boswell's "Life of Johnson." Instead they want Bruce Barton to write about Coolidge in a single column newspaper interview."

Mrs. Meloney did not go deeply into her theory of reader-interest cycles. She said she had not heard it discussed before unless, perhaps, the cyclic theory of human history as written by Mark Sullivan touched also upon literary values.

There is one appeal, she said, that must be in evidence through all the cycles in all popular writing, and that is sex. From her desk drawer the editor drew several back numbers of the Herald Tribune Sunday magazines. She pointed to articles on love by Galsworthy; on divorce by Owen Davis; on the charm of Galahad by John Erskine. She also drew attention to the illustrations her magazine contained of pretty girls in rather alluring poses.

"You will notice," she said, "that I choose nothing that borders on the neurotic. There is such a thing as clean sex. I realize it may pay handsomely to pander to the tastes of a low order of society. Intelligent people, however, don't care for it, in my opinion.

"After every war there comes a great sex upheaval. The mass taste in reading is toward what in peace time is called vulgarity. Then this highly-sexed interest wears away. From neurotic sex the swing is to romance.

"Just now there seems to be a very wholesome point of view. I find the public interested in action, travel, success. They want to learn how to live happily, healthily.

"Romance is the big word now, not sex. Romance and adventure."

Mrs. Meloney, in support of her contention, mentioned the great public interest in the "King's Henchman" romantic opera by Edna St. Vincent Millay.

In agreement with Mrs. Meloney on this point is Philip A. Payne, managing editor of the New York Daily Mirror. The writer had talked to Mr. Payne, gathering his opinions on reader-interests, before the interview with the editor of the Herald Tribune's Sunday magazine.

Mrs. William Brown Meloney

"People now are wide awake. They want to see things in bright lights, without shadows."

"This is the age of speed. The monthly magazines are from three to five months behind."

"Just now there seems to be a very wholesome point of view. I find the public interested in action, travel, success."

Mr. Payne pointed out that Broadway successes comprise a splendid index of what the public likes. Sex plays, other than the perennial girl-shows, are falling off, he said. The big stage hits at present are mystery plays, such as "The Spider" and "Crime," while the big moving picture successes have been films of adventure such as "Beau Geste" and "Chang." Movies with sex interest uppermost are not as popular as they were a short time ago.

"People are tiring of the hotel room variety of love," Mr. Payne said. "They want moonlight in the garden."

As an editor, Mrs. Meloney strives to maintain a balance of interests, without any one predominating, she said.

"People like the restful and beautiful as well as exciting adventure," she said. "And, above all, people want to laugh. Someday someone should found a religion based on laughter. It would be tremendously popular.

"Finally, and vastly important, the public's desire to be informed should not be overlooked. The daily newspaper cannot go into all the details that people like to hear about. This is one of the most vital functions of a Sunday magazine."

Mrs. Meloney is as interesting to see as her views are to hear. Forty-three years old, and not in the least embarrassed to tell it, she gave me the impression rather of a precocious schoolgirl, whose hair had strangely turned gray, rather than the mother of a grown son and a veteran with more than a quarter of a century experience behind her of newspaper and magazine writing and editorship. Her clear brown eyes sparkled with the light of youthful enthusiasm. They are set deep in her rather thin, intense face, upon which the skin lies smoothly with few wrinkles.

She sat bent forward in her swivel chair, and spoke in crisp, clear, rapid diction. Her mind seemed to flash like a tennis racquet in sunlight, hitting back each question with an answer, swift and sure. One phrase flung out during the conversation may well be the essence of her life philosophy; certainly, it is the rule she follows.

"You have begun to die, I believe," she said, "when you stop being interesting."

Mrs. Meloney struck me as all-newspaper woman, despite her magazine past. She was the editor of various women's magazines from 1914 to 1926.

After having spent $3,000,000 for fiction, she is now back dealing exclusively in fact. She seemed to be enjoying the change thoroughly. Her ability to interpret the public to itself appears, perhaps, to better advantage in the swift drama of the daily and Sunday press than in the magazine, usually trailing by a month or more the procession of human events.

"We've all speeded up," Mrs. Meloney said. Her office staff of five testify to the correctness of this assertion as far as the editorial "we" is concerned. But Mrs. Meloney was talking America in general.

"Radio, moving pictures, airplanes, this is the age of speed," she continued. "The monthly magazines are from three to five months behind. They can't keep up with the speeding times. Readers can't wait five months for a learned interpretation of what happened yesterday. Fifty new things will happen in the meantime.

"There was a time when I did not think much of Sunday newspaper magazines. I had, in fact, arrived at the opinion that the Sunday magazine was a complete failure. Here in New York, I used to say, $7,000,000 worth of paper is being thrown away each Sunday.

"But now I realize the importance of the news, of keeping up with the news. People want quick interpretation of the facts as they happen."

Mrs. Meloney had only just returned from the flood district, where she was given a graphic illustration of the human hunger for news and information. She shared her experience with readers of her magazine section of Sunday, May 22. She wrote:

"In one of the flooded towns, where the people were driven to the levee, they set up a brave little township on that strip 100 feet wide, with the water creeping up. A radio receiving set told them every hour, on the hour, the bare terrific facts of the flood. These were meaningless reports to the safe, dry, comfortable north country—almost the end of the world for them. And on one of these levee villages they found a little press and got out their one-page newspaper, which was distributed up and down the river's edge for miles. Across the front page were these words: 'Hoover is Coming!'"

Since she has been associated with the New York Herald Tribune, Mrs. Meloney has had other experiences justifying her belief that the public is interested in obtaining truthful information in fast order.

"I make frequent surveys to try to find out what the reading public is interested in," she explained. "I have at least five methods, which I use frequently."

"Certainly you would not have me tell all the secrets of my trade," she laughed, when I asked her to describe these methods. "You would laugh at some of them. I will tell you that the least dependable method is the questionnaire. People invariably show off and prevaricate answering a questionnaire."

One obvious way, Mrs. Meloney mentioned, is to listen to what people talk about whenever the two or three of the prayer book are gathered together. Successful editors must be forever eavesdropping.

Not long ago, Mrs. Meloney noticed that what a great many people were talking about was weight control. Fat women wanted to get fashionably thin. Short skirts had declared war on buxom limbs. Lean heroes of fiction were making fat men green with envy.

Almost everybody, Mrs. Meloney found, had their own pet ideas for accomplishing the reduction of avoirdupois. Some of the ideas seemed to her unscientific and dangerous. She made a survey and was astounded at the methods in vogue.

Consequently, she sat down and wrote an article about it, concluding the article with a question which was in effect, "if you want to know really scientific methods of weight control, write me a letter."

"I received 20,000 letters in response to this question," Mrs. Meloney said.

She took the 20,000 letters to Wendell C. Phillips, president of the American Medical Association, and told him that he must call a conference on weight control.

"But you know," Dr. Phillips countered, "it is against our ethics to write for a lay journal like the Herald Tribune."

"All right," Mrs. Meloney replied. "I believe it is also one of the oaths of your profession to help those who ask help. So I'll leave you these 20,000 letters and you can answer them."

Dr. Phillips called the conference, and Mrs. Meloney obtained the 14 articles on weight control which are now nearing completion in the Herald Tribune and in other newspapers where the series was sold.

Mrs. Meloney has had an interesting career. In 1901 she was acclaimed as the first woman to sit in the Senate press gallery in Washington. She was on the staff of the Washington Post at the time. Later she did newspaper work on the Denver Evening Post and the New York Sun.

She was on the Sun when she met William Brown Meloney, then day city editor of the New York World. They were married in 1904, and Mrs. Meloney quit outside work until 1914, when she became editor of Women's Magazine, a position she retained until 1920 when she became editor of the Delineator. She was associate editor of Everybody's from 1917 to 1920. Last year she returned to newspaper work.

"GOOD FLYIN' WEATHER" KEPT AIRMAN FROM NEWSPAPER CLUB DINNER

Lindbergh Hopped Next Day to Paris—Was to Have Been Guest at Affair Honoring Lynch and Beazell—New Club House Predicted

CHARLIE LINDBERGH got as far as the street door of the Newspaper Club, at 133 West Forty-first street, New York City, the night of May 19, and declined to budge a step further. The Flyin' Fool who the next morning was to start his flight to Paris alone was scheduled to appear at the club's dinner in honor of its outgoing president, William P. Beazell, assistant managing editor of the New York World, and its incoming president, Denis Tilden Lynch, political reporter of the Herald Tribune.

After leaving the movies Lindbergh was escorted as far as the club's street door. There he asked his companions, Harry Bruno, chairman of the club's Aviation Committee, and his associate, Captain Blythe, to convey to the diners his regret that he could not be with them.

"I want to get a bit of sleep tonight. It looks like a good flying day tomorrow," he explained.

The club's facilities were taxed above capacity by the dinner. In fact, a rush call had to be sent to the Friars, at the last moment, for extra silver.

Enthusiasm reached its highest point when President Lynch expressed the conviction that before the end of 1927 the club would be justified in planning the erection of its own clubhouse.

"When the lease on our present quarters was signed some five years ago by Charles G. Hambidge, our first president, and now president emeritus, who I regret to say is unable to be present tonight," said Mr. Lynch, "these quarters were intended as temporary and nothing more.

"The ideal on which the club was founded five years ago will help us realize our dream. This club was instituted to keep inviolate the best traditions of our craft, and to prove that an organization of workers and former workers on newspapers, magazines, press associations, news and feature syndicates could exist in New York City without seeking or accepting assistance outside our craft."

At his home, 82 North 14th street, Flushing, N. Y., Mr. Hambidge listened in while the program from 8 to 9 o'clock was broadcast through the courtesy of Station WJZ.

A message from Mr. Hambidge, read at the dinner, said in part:

"I would like to be with you very much, but my physician does not think I ought to have so much pleasure just yet awhile, I will listen in and be with you all in thought."

With Robert E. Livingston, chairman of the dinner committee, as toastmaster, the program included selections by a string quartette, and solos by Mario Cozzi, baritone, Miss Kuoki, Japanese soprano, and Miss Gertrude Owen, soprano. The soloists were supplied through the courtesy of William J. Guard of the Metropolitan Opera House, and chairman of the club's entertainment committee.

In addition to brief talks by Mr. Lynch and Mr. Beazell, Hendrik Willem Van Loon, ascribing his success as a writer of books to the training given him by Melville E. Stone, related humorous newspaper anecdotes and closed his ten-minute talk with the single message to newspaper men:

"Avoid being regarded as respectable."

Among the many messages read at the dinner and over the air was one from F. Stuart Crawford in the White House:

"As a member of the club and a friend of Denis Lynch and Bill Beazell, I would be only too glad to have the President write a letter to be read at your dinner. But it would seem that every dinner committee in the United States is anxious for some word from the President. If the days were many times longer it would be impossible for him to take care of these appeals. If an exception is made, even in cases which are particularly appealing, those who have been denied would feel slighted. And there is no adequate explanation which would prevent such a letter from being claimed as a precedent by those who will make similar requests in the future.

"It is necessary, therefore, to ask the friends of the President if they will have a sympathetic appreciation of this situation and be good enough to excuse him."

John McGraw, scheduled as a speaker, wired his regret that urgent matters which turned up at the last moment made it impossible for him to appear.

Joseph J. Early, the old time reporter to whom the club sent congratulations recently when he became part owner of the Brooklyn Standard Union, which he has served for many years as managing editor, was booked for the dinner to former Police Commissioner McLaughlin, but looked in on the club dinner for a brief time.

William A. Orr sent a message from Culver City, Cal., and members of the staff of the New York Daily Mirror wired:

"Out of the depths of the leather swamp and our hearts, both hard by Brooklyn Bridge, club members of the Daily Mirror speed congratulations to Mr. Lynch and Mr. Beazell and general amnesty to Professor Lee."

The reference to Professor James Melvin Lee, head of the Department of Journalism at New York University, concerned the fact that in the recent club election he ran only two votes behind Mr. Lynch for the presidency. The Mirror telegram was signed by Roy Daniel, Jr., Lou Edwards, Dan O'Keefe, Gene Doane, George S. McCurdy, Steve Partridge, Arnold Prince, Paul Williams, Tommy Tucket and Charles R. Barth.

Bertha Brainard, manager of Station WJZ, paid this tribute to the dinner committee, of which Robert E. Livingston was chairman:

"I only wish that all who desired programs broadcast would be as efficient and satisfactory in their methods of handling arrangements for a dinner."

HOUSE VOTES $30,000 TO TEACH JOURNALISM

Illinois Representatives Approve Bill Providing for Full Department at University—Picture Bill Killed

The University of Illinois will receive $30,000 for the creation of a school of journalism and biennium expenses thereof, if a bill which last week passed the lower house of the Illinois general assembly and is now being considered by the senate committee on education is enacted into law. The bill was introduced in the house by William F. Weis of Waukegan.

It is the result of efforts of the Illinois Press Association, which at its annual meeting last fall in Urbana took up with the university the matter of establishing a college to replace the present courses in journalism. William Smith, editor of the Waukegan Sun, was retiring president at the time.

A bill which would have prevented the taking and publishing of pictures of accused persons until after conviction, had it been enacted into law, was killed in senate committee after having passed the lower house of the assembly. The bill was introduced in the house by S. B. Turner, Negro legislator, Chicago, who was trying to keep out of the Rouge's Gallery pictures of innocent persons, falsely accused and not proven guilty.

Members of the press box got busy on the bill when it came up for discussion in the senate committee and convinced senate members of its impracticability. Parke Brown, political writer for the Chicago Tribune, explained that its passage would prevent the taking for newspaper publication of pictures of criminals who confessed at the time of their arrest.

LIBEL SUITS OUTLAWED AFTER ONE YEAR

New Michigan Statute Prevents "Blackmail" Threats of Litigation and Allows Ample Time for Bona Fide Actions

Persons having grievances against newspapers of proportions to warrant libel actions must act with a moderate amount of speed if they are to avoid having their suits outlawed in Michigan in the future. In the closing days of the recent legislative session the senate passed Rep. Frank Darin's house bill which places a limit of one year upon the launching of this type of legal action. Gov. Fred W. Green promptly signed the act and it will become effective early in September.

Under the new law formal court action must be commenced within one year from date of publication of the offending article. In the past belated libel suits have been fairly frequent and they are said to have been made the instruments virtually of blackmailing efforts, the complainants using the threat of libel against a paper for some long past and forgotten slip in order to bludgeon it into some course of action favorable to the "libeled" person's interests. It was argued by proponents of the measure that the change in the law could not affect adversely any legitimate claim against a paper and that it might prevent the dragging up of ancient matters to satisfy subsequent grudges or tardy desires to profit from old errors.

CONSIDERING MELLETT MEMORIAL

Comprehensive Campaign for Endowing Journalism School Mapped Out

A plan to raise money for a proposed school of journalism at Indiana university, Bloomington, as a memorial to Don R. Mellett, slain Canton (O.) editor, which would cost $350,000 has been presented to the trustees and though it has not been acted on it is said the trustees are interested in the plan.

In case the project is approved by the board, representatives would visit every city of 50,000 population east of the Rocky Mountains and an active campaign would be conducted throughout the United States in behalf of the movement.

Headquarters of the campaign would be at Bloomington, Indianapolis and Canton, O., where Mellett was killed while conducting a fight against the underworld. Many prominent newspaper men in the country have agreed to help with the campaign, which was started by students of journalism at Indiana university, and a number of contributions have been received, although active solicitation has not started.

LONDON, May 4.—Having just completed twenty-five years' editorship of the London Daily Express, Ralph D. Blumenfeld, at one time business manager of the New York Herald, was entertained at dinner by the staff of the Express at the Hotel Victoria, London, on April 30. The gathering included men who had worked with Mr. Blumenfeld from the early days of the Express and who are still on the staff.

Lord Beaverbrook, proprietor of the paper, presided and in his speech in honor of the guest of the evening, named the veterans, 34 of them.

Replying to the toast of his health, after some of the veteran newspapermen had recounted reminiscences of the paper's early days in Shoe Lane, just off Fleet street, Mr. Blumenfeld said that the marked improvement in the working conditions in Fleet street in the past quarter of a century was due to the attitude of Lord Beaverbrook, who believed in good pay for good service.

The Daily Express was started in 1900, during the South African war, and adopted what was then an innovation in printing the news on the front page, a style it has followed, despite the general change on the part of London morning papers to running advertisements on the front page. The late Sir Arthur Pearson, who is probably better remembered by the public in the capacity of the founder of St. Dunstan's fund for soldiers blinded in the war, and who started Pearson's Weekly, and the publishing house of C. A. Pearson, founded the paper and was for some time its editor.

Mr. Blumenfeld joined Mr. (as he then was) Pearson in 1902 having been previously London correspondent of the New York Herald, business manager of the Herald in New York, and news editor of the London Daily Mail. When Sir Arthur Pearson lost his eyesight in 1912 and was compelled to relinquish his newspaper interests Blumenfeld formed a syndicate that acquired control of the Express and he became chairman and managing director of the concern, which was acquired by Lord Beaverbrook several years ago.

INVITES SCHOOL PROBE

Oklahoma U. Chief Asks Editors to Survey Journalism Courses

W. B. Bizzell, president of Oklahoma State University, last week sent a letter to C. S. Storms, president of the Oklahoma Press Association, asking that a committee be appointed to make a thorough investigation of the school of journalism of the University.

The president's action followed the adoption of a resolution by the executive committee of the association at its annual meeting last week. Instructors would be required to have five years' actual newspaper experience under the resolution, which was sent to the board of regents.

OREGON MEETING POSTPONED

Dates of Coast Editors' Convention Changed from July 22-23 to Aug. 5-6

Dates for the annual meeting of the Oregon State Editorial Association have been changed from July 22 and 23 to August 5 and 6, because of a conflict with the state meeting of the American Legion.

The first day of the convention will be held at Roseburg and will be a business session. The following day the editors will leave Bandon for a beach outing. The day at Roseburg will also include a golf tournament and a dance at the Roseburg Country Club. A. L. Mallory of Tillamook is president of the association.

INLAND DENOUNCES FREE PUBLICITY OCTOPUS

Postal Rates, Cost Finding and Cash Discount to Advertisers Other Topics Covered by Speakers at Annual Spring Meeting in Chicago—Harrison Presides

(By Telegraph to EDITOR & PUBLISHER)

CHICAGO, May 25.—The problem of free publicity in newspapers was brought up for the consideration of the members of the Inland Daily Press Association at the last session of the spring meeting held Tuesday and Wednesday, May 24 and 25, at the Palmer House.

In bringing up the question of free publicity, T. O. Huckle of Cadillac, Mich., representative of his state on the board of directors of the Inland, cited the stand EDITOR & PUBLISHER has taken against free publicity as an indication of the seriousness of the problem.

"Is free publicity a dead issue?" he asked in the course of his talk. "No, it is more alive now than ever. When EDITOR & PUBLISHER will give over six pages in three weeks in helping publishers fight this great octopus, it is time for all members of the Inland Daily Press Association to do their part. Just throwing it into the waste paper basket will not do the trick. Help by sending it back to the agency which sent it to you."

Mr. Huckle gave figures to show the amount of publicity matter which reaches his desk in a short period of time, and its sources.

In a resolution urging Congress to restore the second class postage rates of 1920, the Inland expressed its dissatisfaction with the present rates, as they apply to newspapers. Present rates are excessive, the resolution read, and the need for their adoption during the World War has passed. Will H. McConnell of Springfield, Ill., is chairman of the postal committee.

Another resolution passed provided that "when a member submits adequate reason for inability to make the cost finding report for the preceding year and definitely signifies his intention of making such report for the current year, the year's summary may, in the discretion of the cost finding committee, be furnished him."

The resolution followed lengthy discussion by members on the inability of the cost finding committee to get members to report. The committee consists of C. R. Butler, Mankato, Minn., chairman; A. J. Wilhelm, Huntington, Ind., and W. R. Ronald, Mitchell, S. D.

Principal speakers at the Inland meeting were Richard J. Finnegan, co-editor of the Chicago Daily Journal, on "Chicago," and Miss Gertrude Byrne, executive secretary of the Chicago Newspaper Representatives Association, on "Newspaper Representation." Other speakers were Stephen Bolles, editor of the Janesville (Wis.) Daily Gazette, on "Advertising In the Small City"; J. K. Groom, Aurora, Ill., of the Northern Illinois Group, on "The Advertising Agent"; John Benson, of Benson & Gamble, advertising agency, Chicago, on "Conducting An Advertising Agency Business With Profit"; and Gardner J. Thomas, Marion (Ind.) Chronicle, "Contest Subscriptions and Their Treatment By the A. B. C.".

"Advertising agents function in many ways," Mr. Groom declared, in his talk. "They have been treated by newspapers as selling agents on commission and have been compensated on that basis by the newspapers. I used to be opposed to the system, but since national advertising has grown to such vast proportions, largely because of the agents' activities, I have changed my mind, because I am sure that without the advertising agent we would not have the fine national linage we now have. Furthermore, it would cost publishers much more than the standard commission to sell advertisers and to keep them sold on our class of medium. I say that although I know that the agents are charged with trying to spend every possible dollar of their clients' money in magazines and metropolitan newspapers, because that is most profitable.

"We ought not to criticize them too harshly. If there were no agents and the newspapers had to go out after the national business themselves, they would kill the goose that is now laying the golden eggs. Let a couple of thousand newspaper solicitors loose at advertisers direct, and the rotten kind of oversolicitation a majority of newspaper solicitors are guilty of would disgust every advertiser in the land."

Mr. Benson, in his brief talk, declared the cash discount granted by publishers is a big safeguard for their own credit, as it enables the agent to obtain prompt pay from the advertiser and thus have the money in hand for payment of the publishers' bills. He termed the tendency some publishers have shown to eliminate the cash discount an unfortunate one.

"How little capital is actually utilized in agency operation, aside from protecting credit and paying current expenses, is evidenced by the fact that only 6.7 per cent of the total receivables of all reporting members of the American Association of Advertising Agencies were overdue at the end of 1925," he said. "It is evident, therefore, that capital in an agency is not a profit producing factor; it is merely a reserve to protect the agency's credit in event and to the extent that clients fail or delay in payment of bills. Its chief purpose is to assure prompt payment of bills to the publisher. It is thus part of the service rendered to the publisher."

Mr. Thomas declared contests of the high pressure type, using automobiles or extremely valuable prizes to induce readers to participate are a menace to the "truth in circulation program."

"Unless measures are taken which will seriously penalize the publisher for instituting such tactics, or some positive method of measuring circulation reports, confidence in the Audit Bureau of Circulations will be destroyed," he said.

"In supposing there are two newspapers in a small town and one of them institutes an automobile contest and gets credit through the A. B. C. for circulation in which a big number of the people receiving the paper fail to pay a penny for their subscription. The competitor of this newspaper knows these should be thrown out as contest subscriptions. The first thought of the competitor is 'if that bird can get away with a proposition like that I might as well do the same' and unless he is on guard and looks ahead for the ultimate future of his business, he falls in the same rut."

"The only way to advertise in a small city is to advertise in the small city newspaper," Mr. Bolles declared, in his speech. "Whatever else one does is auxiliary, collateral and supporting to that advertising. "Universality of newspaper reading makes the newspaper the major medium of reaching the small city just as it does the people of the larger city. There is not a whit of difference. I could dismiss the subject in a sentence—treat the small city just as you do the larger one."

John H. Harrison, president of Inland, presiding for the first time at this meeting, led in the round-table discussions of the many and various problems brought up for the consideration of the members.

In referring to the subject "How To Increase Circulation," Mr. Harrison stated that his paper the Danville (Ill.) Commercial-News had tried out contests, schemes, and many methods for building circulation, and had come to just one conclusion and that is "print as good a newspaper as you can in accordance with your income, and then use high-powered salesmen to sell it." He included the carrier boys as a very potential factor in the expansion of circulation.

Inland dues are more fully paid up now than at any time in the history of the Association, the secretary-treasurer, Wil V. Tufford of Clinton, Ia., reported. He also announced that Inland members had been invited to the convention of the Southern Newspaper Publishers Association in Atlanta, Ga., July 4, 5, and 6, in observance of that Association's twenty-fifth anniversary.

A meeting of the Illinois members of the Associated Press held a meeting Tuesday afternoon in the Palmer House at which time a discussion on the installation of printing telegraph machines occupied the time.

The Lee Syndicate of evening newspapers were all represented in a get-together session on Monday, May 23, in the Morrison Hotel with John Huston, business manager of the Ottumwa (Ia.) Courier, as chairman. The following attended the session and on Tuesday and Wednesday attended the Inland convention: Frank Burgess, business manager, LaCrosse Tribune; D. S. Grieg, advertising manager, LaCrosse Tribune; Penn Wright, of the Madison State Journal; Ed Usher, advertising manager, Madison State Journal; Lloyd Geer, advertising manager, Mason City (Ia.) Globe-Gazette; Clyde Rabedeaux, business manager, Muscatine (Ia.) Journal; George Gaibel, advertising manager, Muscatine Journal; L. D. Upton, business manager, Kewanee (Ill.) Star-Courier; E. L. Sparks, business manager, Hannibal (Mo.) Courier-Post; Fred Russell, business manager, Davenport (Ia.) Times; John Huston, business manager, Ottumwa (Ia.) Courier. Mrs. Wright, Mrs. Upton and Mrs. Burgess accompanied their husbands.

SHUMAN AGAIN OFFERS A. N. A. E. TROPHY

Loving Cup to Be Awarded Best Local Campaign at Annual Meeting in Denver—Frank E. Tripp 1926 Winner

A. L. Shuman, vice-president and advertising director of the Fort Worth (Tex.) Star-Telegram, is again offering the Shuman Trophy, a large silver loving cup, for the best story of a newspaper advertising success presented at the Denver Convention of the Association of Newspaper Advertising Executives to be held June 27-29.

A. L. SHUMAN

Last year the Shuman Trophy was won by Frank E. Tripp, general manager of the Gannett Newspapers, with an outline of a successful campaign conducted by a group of independent grocers.

Frank T. Carroll, Indianapolis News, and A. N. A. E. president, in urging others to compete this year said at least one member of the association added 100,000 lines of advertising by adopting Mr. Tripp's plan after the 1926 convention.

Mr. Carroll has informed members they may enter as many different stories as they wish and several members of a newspaper's staff may also compete. He suggested that contests be held by newspapers among their staff members. The story submitted may concern the results from a single advertisement or from a campaign. Other things being equal, a story on a campaign will be given preference. Practicality of the plan considered and its adaptability to other markets will be important factors in awarding the trophy.

I. A. A. MOVES TO ORGANIZE RESEARCH BUREAU

Plan of C. K. Woodbridge, President, Endorsed by Detroit and New York—Is Elaboration of Program Recommended by Advertising Commission—Members to Vote on Idea at Denver Meet

WHAT its backers describe as "a most progressive plan" for the future activities of the International Advertising Association will be presented at the annual convention at Denver, June 26-29.

The plan was endorsed on Monday this week at a meeting of leaders of the Adcraft Club of Detroit, who at the same time passed a resolution requesting C. K. Woodbridge, present president of the I. A. A., to run for a third term, in order to carry the idea into reality.

Details of the idea, which is credited to Mr. Woodbridge, are being withheld pending formal presentation in Denver, but it was announced this week that it is an elaboration of the educational program drawn up by Walter A. Strong of the Chicago Daily News and adopted by the Advertising Commission in Baltimore recently, which will also be recommended to the I. A. A. executive committee this June.

It provides for the establishment of a research bureau to analyze the economic and educational values of advertising and the development of an efficient distribution system for up-to-date and proved advertising information.

Committees are being appointed in various cities to urge adoption of the Detroit plan at Denver. Joseph Meadon of the Franklin Press of Detroit is chairman of the committee of the Detroit Adcraft Club; while Rowe Stewart, Philadelphia Record, is chairman of the committee of the Poor Richard Club of Philadelphia.

The committee of the Advertising Club of New York was appointed at a luncheon meeting at the Union League Club this week, at which H. R. Swartz, president of R. Hoe & Co., was host. Frederick W. Hume was named chairman, and the committee is made up of James O'Shaughnessy, secretary of the American Association of Advertising Agencies; Charles C. Green, Charles C. Green Advertising Agency; Gilbert T. Hodges, New York Sun; and James C. Auchincloss, president of the New York Better Business Bureau.

"The sole idea behind the plan is to co-ordinate the various suggestions that have been made and work out a program which will offer a dollar for dollar interest in the I. A. A.," Mr. Hume explained to EDITOR & PUBLISHER. "It will be submitted to all the clubs, the affiliated associations, and sustaining members for their approval and endorsement.

"I personally consider it a really practical plan, which will make the I. A. A. an outstanding authority on all advertising problems. It will satisfactorily answer the questions: 'Why is the I. A. A.?' and 'What and who does it benefit?"

Attending the New York luncheon meeting Monday were Frank Presbrey, president of the Frank Presbrey Company, advertising agency; Stanley Resor, president of the J. Walter Thompson Company, New York advertising agency; Charles C. Green, president of the Charles C. Green Advertising Agency; Earle Pearson, general manager of I. A. A.; Louis Wiley, business manager, New York Times; Charles Austin Bates; William A. Thomson, director of the Bureau of Advertising of the American Newspaper Publishers Association; Harold Hall, business manager of the New York Evening Telegram; Gilbert T. Hodges, New York Sun, and Mr. Hume.

Mr. Hume was careful to point out that there was complete harmony in the I. A. A. No conflict existed he said, between the new Detroit plan and the recommendation of the Advertising Commission.

Mr. Strong has stated that the Commission's program is still in a formative state. The report adopted by the commission at Baltimore was drawn up by a committee headed by Ezra W. Clark of Buchanan, Mich., representing the Industrial Advertisers Association. It likewise provides for a research foundation upon which future educational activities are to be predicated.

W. Frank McClure, for many years chairman of the Advertising Commission, has declined the nomination this year. George M. Burbach of the St. Louis Post-Dispatch, and present vice-chairman, has been appointed McClure's successor, subject to the vote of the members at Denver.

Senator William E. Borah of Idaho is still considering the invitation to address the I. A. A. in Denver tendered him last week by Mr. Hodges and Mr. Hume.

Senator Borah has accepted the invitation to address the Pacific Advertising Clubs Association's convention to be held at Portland, Ore., June 19-22.

Other speakers at this convention will include President Woodbridge; Upton Close; Harry Chandler, publisher of the Los Angeles Times; Otis Shepard of Foster Kleiser, Los Angeles; Ralph Merritt, Sun Maid Growers, Fresno, Cal.; Harold J. Stonier, vice-president of the University of Southern California and president of the Advertising Club of Los Angeles; Paul Shoup, executive vice-president of the Southern Pacific Lines; L. M. Barton, advertising manager of the Chicago Daily News; Bertha K. Landes, mayor of Seattle; W. D. Moriarity, professor of economics, University of Southern California; B. M. Rastall of California, Inc.; and Edward L. Greene, managing director of the National Better Business Bureau, New York. Marshall N. Dana of Portland is president of this departmental of I. A. A.

A meeting of the international program committee under the chairmanship of E. D. Gibbs of the National Cash Register Company, Dayton, was held in New York this week and it was stated that the complete program for the Denver convention would be ready for publication next week.

In addition to a substitute for Secretary Hoover, the committee is seeking to fill the place of Secretary Work who also will be unable to go to Denver.

Additional speakers not previously announced will be W. E. Harkness, president of the American Telephone and Telegraph Company; and John F. Owens, Oklahoma City Gas and Electric Light Association.

The Associated Retail Advertisers, headed by George B. Forristall, advertising and sales manager of Foley Brothers Dry Goods Company, Houston, Tex., will consider the best methods of using newspaper space.

A speaker on this topic will be W. E. Donahue, manager of the local advertisthe department of the Chicago Tribune. There will also be an open forum presided over by Miss R. McCluney, advertising manager of Ackemann Brothers, Elgin, Ill., on the subject of "Getting the Newspaper With You."

Other speakers at the retail departmental will include Frank A. Black, publicity manager of Wm. Filene's Sons Company, Boston, on "Retail Radio Advertising in Boston"; F. W. Crankshaw, member of the executive staff of Amos Parrish & Co., New York, on "Profit—the Measure of Success"; Lulu E. Eckels, past president of the Los Angeles Advertising Association. Bromfeld of Denver, on "I Am the Customer."

Among the prominent speakers scheduled to address the Outdoor Advertising Sessions at Denver, holding three sessions beginning June 27 are Sir William Veno, governing director, Veno Trust Ltd., of Manchester, England, who is crossing to the United States especially for the Denver convention; Harry F. O'Mealia, president and C. B. Lovell, general manager of the Outdoor Advertising Association of America; Kerwin H. Fulton, president, General Outdoor Advertising Company, New York; C. K. Woodbridge, president, I. A. A.; Joe Mitchell Chapple, Boston writer; Edward H. Gardner, professor of Business Administration, University of Wisconsin; Don E. Mowry, secretary, American Community Advertising Association, Madison, Wis.; George W. Kleiser, president Foster & Kleiser Company, San Francisco; E. Allen Frost, general counsel, Outdoor Advertising Association.

A wide range of subjects will be covered. These will concern the artistic, esthetic, merchandising and operating phases of outdoor advertising.

The first session will be presided over by President O'Mealia of the Outdoor Association the second by Tom Nokes, treasurer of the group, and the third by S. N. Holliday of the General Outdoor Advertising Company, New York.

A headliner addressing the departmental session of the American Community Advertising Association is Mayor Rolph of San Francisco, who is one of the best known exponents of community advertising in the country.

Key, general manager of Oklahomans, Inc., C. W. Stokes, assistant publicity agent of Canadian Pacific Railway, Montreal; J. W. Kearney, manager of publicity, Missouri Pacific Railway, St. Louis; Mrs. Robert G. Coulter, Coulter & Payne, Inc., San Antonio, Tex., and Don E. Mowry, general secretary of the Madison (Wis.) LL.D. FOR W. R. HEARST

Publisher Deliver Baccalaureate Address at Oglethorpe Commencement

William Randolph Hearst was honored with the degree of Doctor of Laws by Oglethorpe University at commencement exercises in Atlanta, May 22, President Thornwell Jacobs characterizing the publisher as "counsellor of millions, lover of America, exponent of a perpetual peace entente among the English-speaking peoples of the world."

Mr. Hearst delivered the baccalaureate address at the exercises Sunday evening and was a guest with other celebrities who were awarded degrees at a banquet Saturday evening. In his address, Mr. Hearst outlined the aims and methods of operation of his proposed league of English-speaking peoples for world peace, which his newspapers have advocated.

Commenting upon the occasion, the Atlanta Journal, evening competitor of Mr. Hearst's Georgian, said:

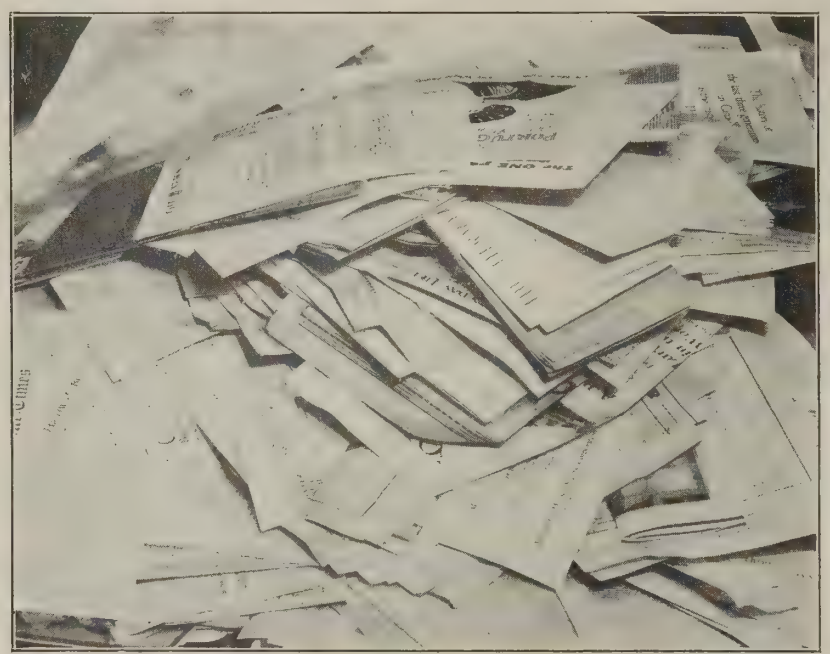
"The climax of the ceremonies will be reached in bestowal of of the degree of Doctor of Laws on that internationally renowned journalist and publisher, William Randolph Hearst. Atlanta greets Mr. Hearst as one who has shown faith in her destiny and who has given her in the Georgian and American the utmost that generous resources, loyal service and high talent can produce. The Journal extends to him fraternal welcome."



FEW NUGGETS IN MOUNTAIN MASS OF PROMOTION SENT TO AGENCIES

Tiresome Superlatives and "Leadership" Claims Disregarded by Space Buyers—Accurate Market Data Valued Most—Average Broadside "Below Par"

By HAMMOND EDWARD FRANKLIN

"A MOUNTAIN of mail—and only 12 approaches from newspaper publishers made any serious impression on me!"

That was the verdict this week of one typical agency executive after checking over, with more than ordinary care, the huge amount of promotion literature from magazines, trade papers, newspapers, press agents and many others which had inundated his office, like a Mississippi flood, during the month.

Mountain of promotion matter from newspapers photographed in advertising agency office.

"The large metropolitan papers in many cases are as bad offenders as their smaller brethren in the material and form they use by mail to sell space," he concludes. "There ought to be a law against some of the atrocities which are sent us in the name of promoting the sale of the space of some newspapers.

"Go into any advertising agency or national advertiser's office, look over what is being received by mail from newspapers and you will see that it is, as a whole, below par. The few cases of really constructive promotion are so unusual as to be refreshing. The newspapers can learn a great deal from the magazines.

"Some day—would that I might live to see it!—the newspapers will quit running a big, blatant, black type full-page advertisement designed to take a crack at their rival down the street (who can make equally strong claims by juggling the figures) and will not shove this heterogeneous conglomeration out to the agencies in the form of a would-be impressive broadside.

"Give less thought to yourselves, and more to the problems of your advertisers. Put less emphasis on circulation figures and more on markets. Send out your material in more interesting and usable form.

"The continuous squabbles between papers over which is the leader in circulation, with mud thrown and cries of 'Liar, liar' are of interest chiefly to the two publications concerned and make very little impression on us. For all we know, both are wrong. It hurts the cause of newspaper advertising as a whole." As an example of really high grade promotion, the agency man pulled out a copy of "The Indianapolis Radius 1927" just received from the Indianapolis News. Quiet, artistic and conservative in appearance, this 24-page brochure first sold its locality as a market and then, incidentally, quietly stated that it is a logical medium with which to reach the market. An extra color was used judiciously on each of the 8½ by 11 inch pages.

First, the book pointed out that Indianapolis is a major market of 2,000,000 population, followed by three pages of really interesting data. Then the wholesale situation with a partial list of wholesalers was reviewed. The circulation of the News was compared with cost of shelter in various parts of the city on a map, the 57 years of accomplishment in various directions were summed up on another page, charts showed the linage records over a period, linage by various classifications was made graphic by circles, delivery service was explained, merchandising service outlined, character of the paper discussed and a complete summary of the dealers of various kinds in the city and territory included.

"The kind of a book we would be glad to pass along to a client who might be interested in getting more Middle West business", was the comment of the agency man.

"New facts about Albany and the capitol district", a four page 8½ by 11 inch printed piece, gave much valuable information from the Knickerbocker Press and Albany Evening News. The inside spread contained an unusual map of the market. The back page analyzed circulation in all towns in its territory as compared with families, grocers, druggists, department or general stores.

The Chicago Tribune, always one of the keenest in its promotion, has begun the publication of the Chicago Tribune Survey, a monthly report on current business conditions in Zone 7, something in treatment on the order of the Harvard Business Review.

Kram-Full, a monthly house organ devoted to the "unrecognized cities in the United States," the foreign language market, has done invaluable educatonal work for Louis Kram, Inc., representatives of New York City. Instead of linage, this house organ talks markets.

Occasionally a newspaper executive makes an address on some subject which is very pertinent to advertising, such as "Tendencies Good or Bad In Newspaper Circulation Methods" by John H. Fahey, publisher of the Worcester Post. This made an interesting 28-page folder.

"The bread and butter zone", a rich, new market for manufactured goods", an analysis of its market by the Minneapolis Tribune, struck twelve recently with many agency executives because of its detailed market and circulation information.

An unusual advertisement in colors, "Little Dramas In the Life of a Great Newspaper System", sent out by the Scripps-Howard Newspapers, held attention by the sheer drama of its story and artistry of the copy.

One agency man I know declared he found very useful the 1927 "Information About St. Louis and Its Great Merchandising Market, a Book of Facts About the Billionarea", termed a "decision book"' put out by the Post-Dispatch. The report is in cardboard tabbed folder for filing.

Still another of this type of promotion is "A Merchandising Study of Altoona, Pa.", which is an excellent example of what may be done. Facts take the place of "hurrahs."

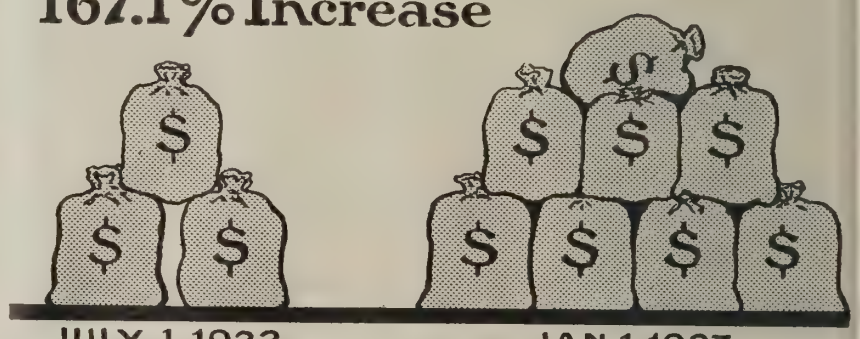
Favorable comment also was made of a four-page small mailing piece from the Spokesman-Review and Spokane Daily Chronicle, with the papers' trademark figure pointing out new facts which place a new importance on that city as a market.

Smaller city newspapers through New England have been mailing out a series of information, one city at a time, about conditions and manufacturing done within their borders.

A few newspapers have set the style of mailing out copies of house organs which circulate among their own employes. The Trib, published by the Chicago Tribune, has long done this. The Scripps-Howard News is the newest. The Little Times from New York Times and the Sun Rays from the New York Sun also are in this group of house organs.

Many agency men peruse with interest the merchandising papers which are sent them. Some 25 have been received at one agency within the last several weeks. The copy being used by various advertisers, the stories on campaigns, information on local conditions, etc., all are suggestive. Several of these papers give the name of the agency and the linage in the contract received on the various accounts.

The "letter from the satisfied advertiser" almost invariably wins interest. The New York American, Chicago Tribune, the New York Day, the Oakland (Cal.) Post-Enquirer, the Des Moines (Ia.) Register and Tribune-Capital, the Vancouver Evening Sun, and New Orleans Times-Picayune recently have employed this form tellingly.



"These 12 big manufacturers told their story to the Levys" is the headline on page one of the Jewish Market, a four-page house organ published by the Jewish Morning Journal and the Day, New York, with success stories.

The Birmingham News every month publishes the national advertising linage for every account running in Birmingham papers. It is interesting for an advertiser to compare his figures with others in the same class.

Several cases were noted where publishers sent out special letters with reproductions of their advertisements in ad-

Florida Leads the Nation in Bank Deposits Growth

IN the four and a half years from July 1, 1922, to January 1, 1927, the deposits in Florida's banks increased 167.1 per cent—a greater percentage of gain than was shown in the same period by any other state.

These figures, brought right up to the present year, indicate the healthy business condition of Florida and give evidence of the high buying power of its people.

Florida is a fast growing state with fast growing demands. It offers an exceptional market for all kinds of advertised products—a large and important part of which market can be effectively covered through advertising in—

New York Evening Journal,

New York, N. Y.

Gentlemen:

In going over past records the other day we compiled some interesting percentages which should be of interest to you.

Our advertising investment in the New York Evening Journal has increased 340 per cent since 1909. During this period our sales volume increased 480 per cent. Here are the figures:

	Evening Journal Investment	Bloomingdale's Sales Volume
For Fiscal Year of 1926...	$249,277.20	$24,315,457.68
For Fiscal Year of 1909...	73,019.30	5,098,905.27

We have found it good business to concentrate a great part of our advertising investment in the New York Evening Journal for over 25 consecutive years.

Our steady sales growth year after year has fully justified this advertising policy. Naturally, we have planned to use the Evening Journal as extensively as ever during 1927.

Very truly yours,

for over 25 consecutive years!

The New York Evening Journal has been the back-bone of Bloomingdale Bros.' advertising for over a quarter of a century.

They "FOUND IT GOOD BUSINESS" to invest $73,000 in the New York Evening Journal back in 1909, when their annual sales amounted to $5,098,905. They found it BETTER BUSINESS to invest $249,000 in the New York Evening Journal in 1926 when sales totaled $24,315,457. They find it STILL BETTER BUSINESS to use the New York Evening Journal AS EXTENSIVELY AS EVER during 1927.

Bloomingdale Bros. realize that every day the New York Evening Journal is bought by 686,740 people, and taken HOME—where it is read by over two million men, women and children.

KEY TO CONSUMER BUYING ABILITY

Statistical Rating of Counties and Cities for Products of General Appeal, Graded in Six Major Classes of Quality and Cost—An Original, Simplified and Tested Formula from Basic Data

By NELSON H. SEUBERT

A STATE with a prosperous middle class is the picture given on this and following pages in the map, charts, and tabulations of New Hampshire, the second in the series which EDITOR & PUBLISHER began last week, to delineate the consumer buying ability of the United States by territories.

As the general outline published last week set forth, this series is based on the premise that estimates of consumer buying ability rest upon two basic elements—Population and Income. A study of these two elements properly related will give a close approximation of the potential wealth or buying power of any community for products of mass appeal.

As people and money are not evenly distributed, and this unevenness of distribution is the distinction between good, poor and bad markets for various classes of products, a brief outline is given below of the method followed in applying these factors to produce indices for six principal classes of manufactures and services.

An arbitrary weighting which checks fairly accurately is given to the various classes as follows: In Class I, the class for cheap necessities and bulk staples, percentage distribution of population counts 90 per cent and percentage distribution of income 10 per cent because no matter how much of a necessity an article may be, the money available for buying will have an influence and should be set over against the population figures. For brevity's sake "percentage of population distribution" will hereafter be referred to as "Population" and "percentage of income distribution" as "Income." In the same way quality, high priced luxuries and non-staples of mass appeal should come somewhere near following the figures under Class V because that is a weighting. VI is for the fancy priced exclusive luxuries of high unit value and the weighting is the same as Class V except that incomes of $10,000 and more were substituted for all incomes. The reason for this substitution is obvious.

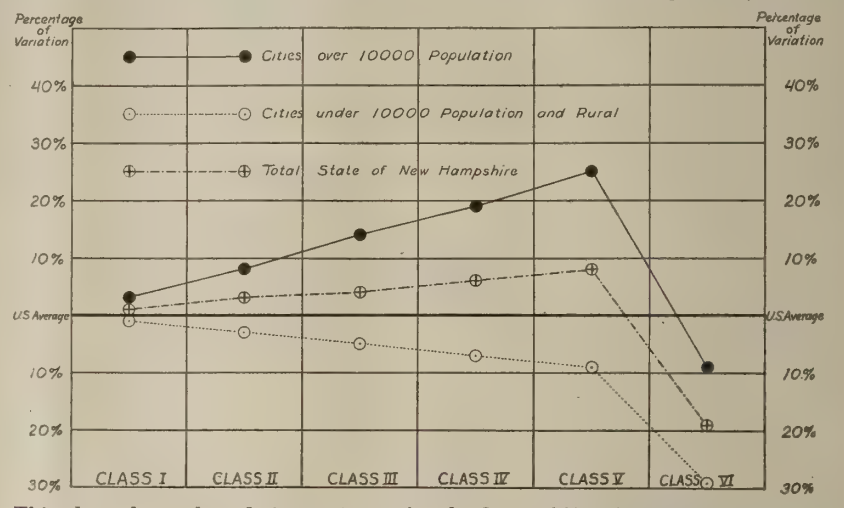
Here then are the descriptions of the six classifications and their corresponding weighting of population and income:

Class I Cheap necessities and bulk staples. Population 90 per cent. Number of incomes 10 per cent.

Class II Moderate priced necessities and packaged staples. Population 70 per cent. Number of incomes 30 per cent.

Class III Quality priced necessities and staples. Cheap luxuries and low priced non-staples. Population 50 per cent. Number of incomes 50 per cent.

Class IV Fancy priced necessities and staples. Moderate priced luxuries and non-staples. Population 30 per cent. Number of incomes 70 per cent.



Class V Quality priced luxuries and non-staples. Population 10 per cent. Number of incomes 90 per cent.

Class VI Fancy priced exclusive luxuries of high unit value. Population 10 per cent. Number of incomes over $10,000 90 per cent.

The computation of the index numbers was done in the following manner:

The population of the United States is represented as 100 per cent (1925 estimates), the percentage of population in each State, County and City over 10,000 population was figured and carried out four places beyond the decimal point in order to have a figure for the smallest communities. The same process was followed with the "number of all income tax returns" (1924 returns) the total for the United States was represented as 100 per cent, or, carried out four places beyond the decimal point 100.0000 per cent. The same process was also followed with the "number of income tax returns over $10,000" (1924 returns).

Your resultant figure each time is in reality a percentage of that particular class market located in the city or county. However, for the sake of simplicity the decimal points have been omitted, also the zeros to the left of the number have been dropped, and the resultant figure has been called an index number.

If the zeros and decimals were replaced New Hampshire would look like this:

I was asked a few days ago why we did not group the figures for the cities and counties into trading areas rather than in alphabetical order. This would be an excellent idea if trading areas were all the same, but they are not. A wholesale grocery trading area may extend for many miles while the retail grocery trading area may be only a question of a few blocks. If you are considering the high priced exclusive luxury you will probably find that the trading area for that product is very wide; for example, the trading area for high priced antique furniture is much wider than the area for cheap kitchen furniture.

It would be interesting, however, and I believe very enlightening, if we could group the cities and towns in what might be called City Influence Areas or Newspaper Circulation Areas, Daily as well as Sunday. These areas could be determined by the predominance of total newspaper circulation. For example, let us take a small town Y as being located approximately half way betwen two large cities X and Z. If in analyzing the newspapers of the small town Y you find that there are more newspapers coming from city X than city Z, the conclusions would be that city X would have a primary influence on town Y and that city C would have a secondary influence. It would also indicate that in order to reach town Y by newspaper advertising you would use first city X papers. The ratio of this influence would in a measure be reflected by the ratio of the circulation of X papers to a circulation of Z papers in town Y. If a study of this nature were available then the Buying Ability Indices could be totaled for this particular area and your advertising appropriations for cities X and Z could be related to the potential worth of their territory.

Oregon Journal Wins Point in Suit Over Syndicate Features

The Portland Oregon Journal has won a temporary victory in a suit filed by the Portland Telegram to restrain the Journal from publishing certain comic features distributed by the Bell Syndicate, Inc. The features are "Mutt and Jeff," "The Nebs," and "Funny Folks."

The Telegram, which has been printing these comics, sued on the ground that it had a valid contract with the Bell Syndicate and that the Journal's action in securing the features was part of a plan to eliminate as a competitor the Telegram, which is now being operated by a trustee in bankruptcy.

The Journal contended that the features had been offered to it because the Telegram was months in arrears in its payments to the syndicate.

Circuit Judge Hewitt denied a temporary restraining order and the case will later go to trial on its merits.

GHASTLY MICHIGAN SCHOOL TRAGEDY TAXED RESOURCES OF NEWSPAPERS

Dailies and News Services Rushed Reporters to Village Where Maniac Dynamiter Killed 44—Wire Facilities Meager —Lansing Man First on Scene

SOME notable work by newspapers characterized the covering, last week, of one of Michigan's greatest tragedies and one of the world's most horrifying wholesale murders, the dynamiting of the consolidated school at Bath, a village near Lansing, by a monomaniac farmer. Forty-four persons lost their lives, including the demoniac dynamiter himself and his wife whom he killed previous to blowing up the school. An equal number was injured and more deaths may result as several victims are still in critical condition in local hospitals.

The disaster had perhaps more dramatic and tragic features than any event of the sort ever chronicled and it has furnished thousands of words of copy for Michigan and leading outside papers and the end is not yet. The tragic episode which put the tiny community of Bath unwillingly upon the front pages of newspapers all over the land broke on the morning of May 18, a few minutes after classes had convened for what was to have been the joyous and peaceful final day of school for some 300 children. First news of the catastrophe came to the outside world through frenzied calls to Lansing for all available doctors, nurses, and ambulances. The local dailies, the Lansing State Journal and the Lansing Capital News, heard almost immediately of these appeals for aid but there were no definite facts to be had for the limited capacity of the Bath telephone exchange could care only for the imperative outgoing calls and no one could be reached in the village. Then began a thrilling race to the scene of the disaster between autoloads of newspapermen and photographers.

Frank Pritchard, police reporter for the State Journal, was the first of the press fraternity to arrive and managed to get through the first call to his paper. Magnitude of the horror laid bare in the rustic community on that fine May morning can be realized from the first unprofessional words he transmitted "My God, this is terrible." His first estimate, from a glance at the row of little bodies already taken from the wreckage of the school, was 50 dead and that number, unlike most first estimates, came very near to the facts. The State Journal, with the aid of further facts supplied by two others of its staff, Frank Sallows and Gerald Granger, who had been close behind Pritchard with the staff photographer, rushed to the street with the first extra, about an hour after the catastrophe.

But there were plenty of developments and second and third extras were issued in rapid succession, three special editions having been placed on the street between 11 o'clock and noon. Meanwhile, the Capital News experienced what will go down as one of the most disheartening pieces of misfortune in the history of newspaperdom. With the biggest story in the history of Central Michigan on hand, the press suffered a breakdown and not a single edition could be run until late in the evening.

As a few facts in regard to the tragedy filtered out to the rest of the state and nation via the Associated Press wires from the Journal office and the United Press at the Capital News, many other papers were stirred to action and dozens of reporters and staff photographers were rushed to the scene. The Detroit News mobilized a small army of reportorial talent which reached at its maximum, it was said, 15 men. Other Detroit papers were soon on hand with representatives and Toledo and Chicago dailies also sent contingents. The Herald and Examiner sent an airplane to pick up pictures and the Tribune speeded a staff of photographer by train who sent his pictures back by plane shortly after dawn the next morning. Edward Doherty was sent by the Tribune to report the tragedy. The Toledo News-Bee's city editor and an assistant came from the Ohio city, while the Blade sent Margaret Daney, the only woman detailed to cover the disaster. W. S. A. Douglas, Chicago correspondent of the Baltimore Sun was there. Paul Shafer of the Battle Creek Moon-Journal came by airplane. Fred Grimes, capitol correspondent for the Booth string of Michigan dailies, supplied them with the story of the tragedy. J. P. Brewer, assistant in the Lansing Associated Press bureau, was alone at the time, Gilbert Shilson, who heads the bureau, having been transferred to Benton Harbor temporarily to cover the House of David trial. Shilson was hurried back, however. Foster Eaton handled the story for the United Press. The Detroit Free Press was covered by Frank Morris, Lansing staff correspondent, later assisted by Cash Asher. The Detroit News' rapidly growing representation was soon in charge of the assistant city editor and a direct wire to Bath was installed.

International News Service, immediately on receipt of word from Bath, dispatched two staff men to the scene from the Detroit bureau, who arrived in full time to take hold with the local men working at the damaged building and among the families of the dead and injured.

The Toledo Blade was fully covered on the school explosion at Bath, Mich.

As soon as news of the tragedy reached the Toledo Blade office an airplane was chartered and Norman Hauger, chief photographer, started to wing his way to the scene of the tragedy, 140 miles distant.

A little later William F. Hedrick, managing editor, dispatched an automobile carrying Russell Van Horn, photographer; Walter W. Schramm, news editor, and Margrete Daney, special writer.

Meanwhile, Cameraman Hauger in the airplane was having his difficulties. Near Jackson, Mich., Leroy Davis, the pilot, made a forced landing on account of engine trouble. Both the photographer and the pilot narrowly escaped death or serious injury when the plane bounced over the small field in which they were forced to land.

Mr. Hauger hailed a motorist to reach Jackson, where he hired a taxi to complete the trip. With the pictures safe in his box, Mr. Hauger was able to get back to Toledo Wednesday evening.

The news car, carrying more pictures by Mr. Van Horn, and the reporters, sped back through the rainy night, reaching Toledo shortly after midnight.

An improvised press room was set up at Bath by the various correspondents. A tiny woodshed at the rear of the house sheltering the local telephone exchange was commandeered, portable typewriters were unfolded, and rickety furniture and sticks of stove wood were used as typewriter stands and seats for the busy workmen. A shortage of copy paper soon threatened to curb the output but a visit to the village general store resulted in the purchase of dozens of school copy books which were utilized in the emergency, many writing their stuff long-hand because of the scarcity of typewriters and lack of room for their accommodation. Later the telephone exchange building was practically taken over as more equipment arrived and the residents, stunned like others of the Bath populace by the horrible happening in their midst, permitted the newspaper men free rein. The Detroit News continued to be the only paper with a direct wire, but the Lansing papers, of course, needed none, and the others were soon accommodated by a special Western Union loop.

The story, as it developed, proved more than worthy of all the energy and ingenuity expended on it, and even the hardened newspaper men were shocked by the harrowing details. Briefly summarized, it was found that two explosions which wrecked an entire wing of the fine new consolidated school had been the work of a madman, crazed by misfortune which threatened to take his farm from him through foreclosure of a mortgage. It was inferred that he held a particular grudge toward the school, because it had helped increase taxes, and toward the board members and superintendent because of clashes with them, while acting as treasurer of the board, when he could not get his taxes remitted.

After the tragedy was known the general public promptly moved into Bath in an ever-increasing and ever more arrogant and unsympathetically curious mob. It was estimated that 85,000 persons visited the tiny village over the week-end and picnic dinners were riotiously eaten in yards next to houses where funerals were being held, roads were clogged for miles by cars which interfered with funeral processions, and little consideration was shown in any way for the little rural community which was bravely trying to bear its loss. But these things, also, constituted more material for stories and it appears certain that it will be weeks before Bath ceases to figure in the news columns of the daily press of Michigan and more weeks before it ceases to figure in editorial columns. A relief fund is being raised and the press is taking an active part in promoting this along with governmental and civic agencies.

CHANGE FROM MAGAZINES TO DAILIES JUMPED FIRM'S BUSINESS 100 PER CENT

United Fruit Company's Transportation Business Last Year Was $4,850,000 When Advertising Was Placed in Dailies—Harris, Says Anything Can Be Sold in Papers

A 100 per cent increase in business for the United Fruit Company's fleet in three years followed a switch from magazine to newspaper advertising, Maj. H. L. Harris, vice-president of the S. A. Conover Company, Boston advertising agency in charge of the account, declared in a recent address before the advertising staff of the New York Times.

"A few years ago," he explained, "our people were wedded to magazine advertising and we spent seven-eighths of our appropriation in magazines and about one-eighth in newspapers. We did a very fair business, a business close to $2,250,000 a year.

"And then we decided that the idea was all wrong, that transportation could be better sold in newspapers than in any other way. And so we tried newspaper advertising and today we are spending about nine-tenths of our appropriation in newspapers and one-tenth in magazines. Our business last year was $4,850,000. In other words, it shows a 100 per cent increase in a period of three years.

"I do not think it is necessary for me to say anything else. We haven't any more ships; the population around the Caribbean hasn't increased. Let us assume that one cause for this growth has been the desire for people to travel, which, we will all have to admit, has grown to incredible bounds within the last five years, but after making all sorts of mental and business reservations the fact remains when we spent our money in magazines, we did a business of two and a quarter millions; we turn around and spend the same amount of money and do a business of $4,850,000. If there is any easier way to increase sales than that, I don't know it."

In his address, Mr. Harris gave his ideas on how to use newspaper space. He commented on the universality of the medium. In part, he said:

"I want to set before you very briefly a few ideas which, in the concrete, throw a great deal of light on newspaper advertising. The great trouble with the majority of people who talk about advertising is that they deal with it in the abstract; they set forth a number of rules that you are expected to follow and the fact of the matter is there are no rules. Every case is peculiar to itself and must be followed out on its own merits.

"In the first place, do you remember away back when newspaper advertising hinged on three factors? People used to ask what articles can be most profitably advertised in newspapers? and the answer would invariably be, 'It must be an article that is low in cost, an article for which there is a reasonable constant demand, and an article that the average family can use about ten or twenty dollars worth of a year.' That is all rot, for even in those days, you could sell pianos and automobiles by newspaper advertising. So the burden of proof was more and more thrown away from one type of advertising to that of another. Now the fact of the matter is, I believe, and I believe very earnestly, that almost anything from eggs to escalators can be advertised and sold better in a newspaper than it can be in any other of the various media used for advertising.

"I should like to give you a few facts and figures that show the truth of what I am saying. Let us take the experience, over a period of several years, of the United Fruit Company. That company has a fleet of about one hundred vessels on the high seas, of which sixty are passenger-carrying vessels. They run to the Caribbean and along the north side of South America, and trips last from fifteen to twenty-four days. Ever since the fleet was young, we have carried passengers on those vessels. They are not very large vessels, but they are built especially for service in the tropics.

"Transportation is just exactly like any other material thing. There are only three things to remember in writing a piece of transportation copy for a newspaper: 1. How long is it going to take me? 2. How much is it going to cost me? 3. What am I going to see?

"Please don't think that magazines are not exceedingly useful in an advertising campaign, so far as transportation is concerned. You can build up in them a whale of a lot of atmosphere. You can talk about descriptions of this country and that, about the climate here and there, etc., but don't try that in a newspaper. All you have to say here is something like: 'You can go to Jamaica for fifteen days at a cost of $200.' Transportation, as you all know, is absolutely the biggest economic factor in the world today, and it is one of the easiest things in the world to sell, if you only get on the right track. Let me be reminiscent for just a moment. The last lingering shreds of famine that touched the world was the potato famine in Ireland in 1858. Today famine is a practical impossibility for any civilized place in the world. We have so many steamships and railroads that in case of disaster you wouldn't be more than pleasantly hungry before that hunger would be satisfied, and the world today doesn't dread famine the way it did fifty or sixty years ago.

"Wherever you go, you will find out that there is a constant and a growing desire on the part of people, and sometimes people that you wouldn't expect it from, to see and understand and know more about the world they live in. Travel has grown wonderfully in the last four or five years, and there are two kinds of people that you have to deal with, when you are reaching out to get your travel clientele. People such as we are here, would probably never think of looking in a newspaper or a magazine to discover somewhere to go. If we desire to go anywhere, we would say 'I want to go here or I want to go there, and go.' That is the known factor in all travel or transportation advertising, but outside of that is a tremendous per cent of people who never have traveled and who have no knowledge of how to travel, and it is there that your undeveloped market lies, and it is to those people to whom you must appeal and try to build up your demand in newspapers.

"What is it going to cost. Get your cost down in big type and then underneath that say, "This trip is going to take you so many days and you are going to see Havana or the Panama Canal, or whatever places are listed on your ports of call. Every once in a while, some enthusiastic magazine lady or gentleman comes around to see me and says, 'Ah, but our magazine reaches the class.' That is just the kind of people I don't want to reach. You get them anyway.

"The people who habitually travel will or will not sail on your ships, and nothing you can say or do is going to affect them. The people you want are the people who day after day read the newspapers, people who know their particular newspaper and follow its teachings and its policies and all that sort of thing. And there is more in that than any of us appreciate. It is the big end of a transportation problem to map out a clean-cut campaign and follow it up to a successful conclusion and we have found that newspapers tell our story to a most appreciative audience.

"We list our inquiries, but there is no possible way that I know of that you can figure on actual sales-building around the pro rate that you want to spend. You may get one hundred inquiries, and you may sell two tickets out of the hundred, you don't know! Transportation newspaper advertising is built upon the general principle of what might be termed 'educational institutional good-will.' If you keep hammering on that, you will get somewhere. We try to make passengers feel at home.

"Today you can't sell transportation as a method of going from here to there; to do something after you get there. We sell it on the principle, 'Your vacation begins just as soon as you step on board our ship.' Railroad people do the same thing. It is a clear cut matter of service, and every year finds that service stressed and made better, and the more people you can tell that you have got that service, that you have more to give them, the better line you are going to be, the more travelers you are going to procure.

"And don't forget that the way to increase passenger transportation is to use newspapers, FIRST, LAST and ALL THE TIME;—and you can't go wrong!"

KROCK ON WRITING TRIP

Arthur Krock, formerly of the New York World, now a member of the editorial board of the New York Times, left last week on a three months' trip to important sections of the country to write a series of articles on national politics. The first article of the series, from Virginia, was published on Monday.

Our OLD Type

Characteristics of the new Ionic type which is being used in the news and want ad columns of The Kansas City Star are a higher letter and wider face. The lines composing the type are broader and less susceptible to battering than was the old type.

Legibility is one of the first essentials of a good newspaper. Printing that is hard to read results not only in eyestrain but in mindstrain. Cleanness and clearness are qualities equally as desirable in typography as in literary style.

The first thing an actor or public speaker learns is to enunciate distinctly. By the same token, easy visibility should be the first aim of a newspaper. Without that mechanical prerequisite all other virtues are in danger of being diminished if not entirely lost.

CAUSES OF EYESTRAIN

In crowded, poorly lighted street cars, on corners under flickering arc lights, in vestibules and waiting rooms, on trains and boats and subways, in taxicabs and busses, moving, swaying, jostling, vibrating—under the most trying handicaps to vision—much newspaper reading is done.

Optical authorities tell us that 68 per cent of the people suffer from defective vision. They say they have all the business they can attend to and favor any method that will conserve vision.

THE STAR'S NEW DRESS!

ENDORSED
by Leading Educators and Eye Specialists

Dr. E. A. Bocock,
Superintendent, Colorado General Hospital.
"I think the new type will not only result in a minimum strain to the average reader, but it will be particularly resting to the person suffering with an abnormality of the eye."

A. L. Threkeld,
Deputy Superintendent of Schools, Denver.
"Distinct type is very important in the hygiene of the eye. We recognize that as a very definite factor having a direct bearing on the health and efficiency of the pupil."

Dr. Joseph H. Salov,
Past President, New Jersey Optometric Association.
"It would be unfair for me or anyone else who realizes the amount of good that will result from the new type if this were not recognized, appreciated and so acknowledged by everyone interested in the conservation of vision. It is the accumulated unnecessary strain on the eyes, due to the extremely small and poor type used in many newspapers, that hastens the day when artificial aid must be sought. Although not versed in the nomenclature of type, it is of a style and character that immediately makes itself felt, and is far more readable and comfortable than the former style."

Charles D. Waugh,
President, Wisconsin Board of Optometrists.
"I consider the improvement an excellent thing because it undoubtedly will lessen the strain on the eyesight of the reader. We have long used newspapers to test the eyes of those who seek to be fitted with glasses, our experience being that when they can read with ease newspaper body type, especially figures, their eyesight is good. I do not believe this test will hold with the new type. It is a distinct improvement."

Milton C. Potter,
Superintendent of Schools, Milwaukee.
"I made a comparison of the new type and the old, and the improvement pleased me very much. It is clearer, it is easier on the eyes, it is an even greater pleasure to read the paper, and the effect on both children and adults is bound to be beneficial."

AT THE top of this page are two columns of exactly the same reading matter. One is set in the type face formerly used by The Star. The other is the new Ionic type, which has been installed in all The Star's linotype machines.

It will be observed that the lower case letters are almost as high as the capitals. The proportion is purposely large because linotype designers heeded the fact that small characters compose fully three-quarters of the average newspaper column. They produced an easy-reading font by giving greatest attention to its most read portion.

All Letters Larger

Not only did these designers make the ratio between Ionic's lower case and capitals greater than that of the average Roman face, but descenders were shortened, capitals were heightened, and even more body added to the lower case. Into this large framework they built elements making for maximum legibility.

Ionic has no hairlines; there is practically no difference between the light and heavy strokes. Ionic serifs are sturdy. They are shorter, too, so space that formerly went between letters is now put inside the letters themselves. This, with the greater body size, brings about an even distribution of the "light spaces" in a word or line. Light comes through this new face; not around it.

The openness of the rounded letters—the height and width of the lower case—the clear-cut capitals—the size and fullness of the figures—the absence of marked contrast between thick and thin strokes—the well fitted units—the maximum letter count—all these things go to make this new type a most desirable newspaper face.

No Sharp Corners

There are no "pin holes" or sharp corners to fill up with ink; no fine lines to break down in stereotyping. The even color of the characters is particularly adapted to newspaper stock.

The outstanding advantage of the new face is its conservation of vision. The even tone throughout is restful to the eye without being monotonous. There is enough variation to avoid tiresomeness, yet not enough to be disconcerting.

Result of Many Tests

The experiments which led to the selection of the Ionic characteristics were most exhaustive. They included laboratory tests in visibility, the findings of oculists and optometrists and the preferences of the public under reading conditions which obtain in everyday life without regard to scientific principles.

What science has demonstrated the public has approved.

All The Star's news linotype machines and want ad machines have been equipped with new mats. This change is in accord with The Star's policy of giving its readers a paper which is easy to read—clear in typography and clean in presswork.

PRAISE FOR THE NEW DRESS OF BOLDER FACE TYPE ON TODAY

A Comparison of the Old and the New Type Styles Shows the Increased Legibility and Ease of Reading

The Star's new dress of type, put on this morning, brought much laudatory comment from readers as to increased legibility and ease on the eyes, and, too, from opticians and optometrists, who make a business of eye reactions to various appearances.

Compare this paragraph with the following paragraph. This one is set in the new type, technically known as 7-point Ionic No. 5, and is easier to read than the old style type. The letters are a trifle wider and a trifle higher than the old letters. The result is a bolder face, easier on the eyes. Oculists were called into consultation with experts of the Mergenthaler Linotype Company to devise the new type face, seeking a letter formation that would occupy no more space in the line than the type already in use, yet would relieve much of the eye strain of reading the ordinary newspaper page.

This paragraph is set in The Star's old dress. Notice the big difference. The change in type from this style is in accordance with The Star's policy always to look after the interests of its readers—not merely in the quality of its news and other service, but in all the mechanical arrangements in printing and distributing a half million copies a day. Not only had the "body type" been changed—the regular news column type—but the same change of letter formation has been carried into the 10-point type used in the introduction of "scare head" stories, those of unusual importance, and into the "black face," used for stressing words and lines and paragraphs, into the italics and smaller faces, such as nonpareil and agate.

The following are comparisons of want ads in the new and old type. The new:

DOG—German police, lost or strayed, 3 weeks ago, vicinity 31st and Garfield; reward $25. Delaware 2306.

FUR Piece—Red fox, on Burlington train from St. Joseph, Saturday evening; reward. 143 South Hillside, Wichita, Kas.

GLASSES—Tortoise shell, in leather case, on 10th st. between Baltimore and Walnut. Thursday eve. Melrose 6085M.

The next three want ads are set in the old style type:

BRACELET—Silver link, Tuesday, between 600 N. Liberty, Independence, and 10th and Troost. Reward. Independence 2450.

DOG—Pointer, female; white with liver spots; vicinity 55th and Brookside about ten days ago; reward. Hiland 4222.

PRAISE FROM EYE MEN

Comment Shows The Star's New Type Means Less Strain in Reading

"When I picked up the paper this morning I could see a change at once," M. C. Dale, head of the optical department of the Emery, Bird, Thayer Dry Goods Company, said today. "Then I discovered the explanation that the 'dress' had been changed.

"The new type face is much easier to read. The letters have a blockier appearance, the outlines standing out more clearly. The optician's opinion of a letter is based on the size image it will produce on the retina and, though your new letters are only infinitesimally larger than the old ones, yet they will produce a clearer and larger image on the retina."

Dr. F. M. Phenix in charge of the optical department at Jones Store Company, said today that persons with eye defects certainly should be appreciative of the change in The Star's type, and the appreciation should extend even to those with perfect vision.

"The letters are clear cut and distinct," Dr. Phenix said, "and will cause far less strain on the eyes."

P. Connor, government forecaster and a close student of all things around him, said today that The Star's change of dress was the subject of conversation in his home when the morning edition was brought in from the porch.

"My wife was especially well pleased with the change," Mr. Connor said. "She has complained frequently of the eyestrain attendant to reading as much of The Star as she wants to read, especially the smaller faces. The restfulness of the new type was clearly noticeable to her.

"And I am pleased, too. The old type had a certain dignity that I liked, something on the order of a modified book. You have kept that and achieved more clearness."

Dr. Guy Senton, in charge of the George B. Peck Dry Goods Company optical department, had a mystery solved for him when he was asked today how he liked the change of dress in The Star.

"So that's what it is?" he responded to the question. "I could see the reading was a lot clearer, but I was rushed this morning and had to skim through the paper. I must have skipped the announcement of the change, and I couldn't figure out whether my eyes had got better suddenly or just what had happened."

Purd B. Wright, now city librarian but with a past record that includes having been a printer at one time, said he was amazed when he picked up The Times this morning and started reading.

"It was evident something had happened," Mr. Wright tells. "At first I thought I had slept extra well and that my eyes were in wonderful condition.

"After digging up an old paper for comparison I fully appreciated what had been accomplished, the designing of a type face that loses no space, and yet will be a big benefit to the public in presenting reading matter in letters that are scientifically designed to make them register on the eye without strain or effort."

J. A. Mott, optometrist, sees a direct public benefit in The Star's type change, with a direct reflection in the number of persons who will be able to get along without glasses.

"I can see at a glance that the new type face is going to make it unnecessary for many to begin the wearing of glasses who otherwise would have been forced to it," Mr. Mott said today.

"The shape, the outline and the spacing of The Star's type now is such that even persons with slight defects of the eyes will have no trouble in reading. It is evident the formation of the letters has been figured out scientifically.

"Thus The Star not only improved its appearance, but has added another public service to its lengthy record."

Victor L. Prudden, optometrist, said today that he was examining the letters of The Star's new "dress" with much interest.

"It is evident there has been a scientific study made for the formation of each letter," Mr. Prudden said. "I have made no comparison of the new letters with those of the old style used by The Star, but I can see that each of the new letters is shaped and built to produce the clearest possible image on the retina. The benefit to older persons and those with slight defects of the eyes cannot be measured."

Julius Baer, optometrist, declared that only a cursory examination showed him the new type was plainer, clearer and would relieve a great part of the eyestrain of long reading.

"The distinct outline and character of the separate letter in the new type," Mr. Baer said, "is such that even a person with slight visual defects will find the letters stand out clearly and without the blur such a person usually is bothered with in reading."

WALES RIDES DESPITE INJURY.

Thrown Tuesday, the Prince Enters Two Races, Placing Second and Fourth

(By the Associated Press.)

BARROWBY, LINCOLNSHIRE, ENGLAND, March 24.—Despite his experience of Tuesday in being thrown in the army steeplechase at Holdenby, the prince of Wales rode in two point-to-point races here this afternoon. He finished second in one and fourth in the other.

The prince was limping and leaning heavily on his stick when he appeared for the races, but laughingly declared this had nothing to do with Tuesday's fall. He rode well, using Lady Doone for one race and Cark Courtier for the other. It was the latter horse which threw the prince at Holdenby.

At the end of the steeplechase there is a spur with a dead end on the bank of the river on which stood the disabled locomotive. Instead of taking the main track the passenger train ran onto the spur and struck the standing engine. It was knocked backward about 100 feet and hung over the river embankment. The collision derailed the passenger locomotive and it also hung over the embankment.

The Star In A New Dress

From Kansas City (Mo.) Times, April 18, 1927

THE STAR comes out in a new dress this morning. The type in which it is printed is easier to read than the old style type. The letters are a trifle wider and a trifle higher than the old letters. The result is a bolder face, more legible, easier on the eyes.

Technically the type is known as 7 point Ionic No. 5. It is the product of long research in the laboratories of the Mergenthaler Linotype Company. This company set out with the aid of oculists to devise a type that would occupy no more space in the line than the type in common use, but which would meet the requirements of people who found it something of a strain to read the ordinary newspaper page. By ingeniously stealing a little of the space between the letters, the company's experts found they were able to get rid of hairlines, and to design a letter that was both handsome and distinct. The oculists to whom the new design was submitted agreed that it met the most exacting demands.

The reader who will compare today's issue of The Star with yesterday's will readily admit the increased comfort in reading that the new dress affords.

The change in its type is in accordance with The Star's policy always to look after the interest of its readers—not merely in the quality of its news and other service, but in all the mechanical arrangements in printing and distributing a half million copies a day.

ADVENTURES IN NEWSPAPER PUBLISHING

III.—DISCARDING THE OLD MUD METHOD

By N. E. W. SOUTH

This is the third of a series of intimate stories written from "the inside" by a newspaper publisher who, for obvious reasons, cannot disclose his own identity or that of the newspaper about which he writes.

IN the state of Transcolcavia they take their politics seriously, and nowhere in that commonwealth do they take politics more to heart than in Blanksburg.

When I took over the management of the Eagle, Blanksburg's evening newspaper, this was the way in which many of the good folk of that hustling inland city introduced themselves to me:

"Mr. Telford, I am Mr. Smith, a Republican."

"Mr. Telford, I am Mr. Jones, a Democrat."

Even the ladies made themselves known in similar manner, as I speedily discovered when I was asked to speak before the Business and Professional Women's Club. At that, they were a bit franker than the men, many not only telling me they were Democrats, but adding, "and I don't read the Eagle."

Indeed, I found that a lot of people in Blanksburg were not reading the city's only evening newspaper for no other reason at all apparently than that they were Democrats and the newspaper was Republican in politics. Conversely, I also discovered that not a few Republicans were refraining from reading the city's only morning newspaper for no other cause than that it was Democratic in politics, and they'd be darned if they'd give comfort even to the extent of fifteen cents a week to the Democrats. And in talks with the advertising department, I was shortly told that it was impossible for the Eagle to get the advertising of certain merchants because they were Democrats—that this had been the situation for years.

Of course, there had to be a deep basic reason for all this, and, casting about for it, I believed I had come across it when I looked up the past political history of the two papers and found that they had spent much time and effort in political mudslinging back and forth. To the Eagle, no Democrat could be a good American, and to the morning paper a Republican was just about the orneriest critter to be found on God's footstool. All over the Eagle's territory, its editor was known as Old Poison Pen, even among Republicans, many of whom had been belabored by him in the party's primaries because they had dared to run against men the Eagle favored. This had been going on for years. It had led to life-long enmities; at the time I went to Blanksburg, men who had grown up as boys together had not spoken to one another for heaven knows how long or merely nodded coldly as they met. People were hated or distrusted simply because they were Republicans or Democrats, and, as I figured it out, mostly because of the rabid partisanship of the two papers, in which, I must add in all fairness the Eagle seemed to have been the guiltier party.

I have always been a Republican (except when Roosevelt was a Progressive), but I have always believed that a devotee of the donkey is just as good an American any day in the week as a follower of the elephant, and I made up my mind that under my management the Eagle would treat every one decently in a political way, even if such a course "raised hell" for the paper among the more rabid element in its own party. So I called in Old Poison Pen and said:

"Beginning at once, we are going to be decent to the Democrats, both deserving and undeserving. We are going to uphold Republican doctrines, we are going to be for the Republican party but in doing that we are not going to belittle the Democratic party or any individual Democrat. We are going to assume that a Democrat's motives are as sincere and patriotic as any Republican's. We are going to give him an even break both editorially and in the news columns. There will be no more mud-slinging, no more sneering at any Democratic candidate, no more sarcasm at his expense, no besmirching his political or business record. We are going to fight clean from now on, and if we can't win that way, then it's high time for us to shut up shop as a Republican newspaper.

"Furthermore," I said, "if, as and when the other paper attacks the Eagle, or in any way strives to stir up controversy between us, you are not to answer back. All you are to do is to keep quiet. If you feel it impossible to do that, then write your reply and hand it to me. You will thus get it out of your system. I will at once throw the editorial into the waste basket, and no harm will come to any one, as far as I can see."

The look that Old Poison Pen gave me was a beautifully perfect mixture of horror, disgust and bewilderment, and when he got his voice it was to say:

"The Republicans will never stand for it; they'll raise merry hell, and especially if you insist on not answering the Sun back."

"Well," I said, "there's trouble enough now in this community, what with the partisanship the two papers have kept alive for God knows how many years. I am going to run the risk of stirring up a new sort of trouble. It will at least cause the paper to be talked about, perhaps even adversely, as you say. But that's better than not being talked about at all. So we're going to try out the new policy at once."

The first move I made following my talk with the editor was to put this motto, taken from Lincoln's Gettysburg address, in a box, on page one immediately to the left of the logotype: WITH MALICE TOWARD NONE, WITH CHARITY FOR ALL. And I left it there day after day, to do its own sinking in.

Every day people were still calling to get acquainted with the new general manager. Almost invariably, they would declare themselves as Republicans or Democrats, and my next move was to spread among them by word of mouth, direct from the new manager himself, the new political policy of the paper.

To a man declaring himself a Democrat I would say: "I am very glad to meet you both as a fellow citizen and as a Democrat. I am a Republican. I am going to run this as a Republican paper, but I hope to do it decently and with due regards to the personal and political feelings and convictions of the Democrats. You know, Mr. Blank, I have a theory that, Republicans and Democrats, we are as alike as peas under the pods of our party beliefs in our love of country. It is true that we don't think alike as to the best men to have in charge of our government, local, state, national. But now, really, Mr. Blank, would America be the fine country it is if we did think alike? Wouldn't it, instead, be literally a hell of a place to live in if we did all agree politically? That's my belief, at any rate, and because I believe that a Democratic is just as good a citizen of this land as a Republican, I have issued instructions to the staff here to cut out the intense partisanship, the mud-slinging, when discussing politics. I have also given equally definite instructions that Democratic news must have an equal break with Republican news."

To a man declaring himself a Republican, I would explain the new policy much along the same line. I would, however, emphasize that the Eagle was still going to be the Republican paper of the community, was still going to support the Republican organization in city, county, state and nation, but it was going to do it with fair argument and not with the contents of a mud hole. I would also make it clear that the paper no longer would take sides in the Republican primaries.

"The Eagle will give every primary candidate a fair news break," I would say. "It will report the actual news connected with each candidate's progress. But it will no longer stir up soreness in the party by coming out and favoring this, that or the other man over rival candidates. It is not the function of this paper, as I see it, to tell the Republican voters how they should vote other than to urge them to pick the men who, in their judgment, are best fitted to hold office.

"In order to help the voters to do this thing, we will print a brief record of tach candidate, that will have no personal or official bias in it. We will give the voters the facts, impartially and without prejudice to any man's candidacy. Then, when the voters have picked their men, we will support the ticket, but in doing so, we will not run down the candidates on the other ticket just because they happen to be Democrats. That way of playing the game was played out long since in other parts of the country, and it is high time that it was played out here."

Old Poison Pen had forewarned me that the more rabid leaders among the Republicans would "raise merry hell" over such a course. The truth is that not one Republican leader raised so much as a faint squawk over it. On the other hand, I was agreeably surprised at their unanimity of agreement with it. I think one leader summed up for his fellows when, after hearing me through, he drawled:

"You know, just between us, it's a damned shame. This biting and snarling and turning old friends against one another all on account of politics has gone on much too long in this town. It has hurt the town, too. I have taken it as a matter of course—thought it never could be stopped. I see now it can be stopped if the newspapers will quit stirring the whole thing up. And I don't believe it will hurt the Republicans at all—we can win without everlastingly damning the Democrats."

Of course, the Democrats were jubilant, but generally extremely doubtful that I either would or could carry out such a policy. Some of them frankly told me that they didn't believe the Republican leaders would stand for it. My answer was, wait and see.

So, instead of announcing the new policy in the paper, I spread it by personal interview among my callers. They, in turn, carried the news to their friends and soon the whole town was talking about the darned fool down at the Eagle who thinks he can be decent to us Democrats," as one of that persuasion described his interview with me.

Meanwhile, a couple of weeks went by with no political mud-slinging in the Eagle's editorial columns. "Say, young feller," said a prominent Democrat, stopping me on the street, "you seemed to have meant it, all right. But I'm waiting to see what you'll do when the other fellow down the street aways hops onto you some morning with a red hot editorial before I'll believe you can get away with what you're doing."

Not long after, the other fellow down the street hopped hard, and Old Poison Pen, blood in his eye, came hopping even harder into my office. He had his editorial answer all written out. It was a sizzling one, and he was so wrought up that he could hardly frame his demand that it be run as written and at once.

I read the masterpiece of mud-slinging and invective through, then reached over and deposited it in the waste basket. "Now," I said, "I guess we both feel better."

"Do you mean," shouted Old Poison Pen, "that you're not going to reply?"

"You have me right," I answered. "If we printed that editorial I just put in the waste basket, the other fellow would come back with a ripsnorter, then you'd hit him again, and the old mud would be all over the place. We can't kill him off by replying. I have an idea we can kill him off by silence. We will say nothing."

We said nothing that day. The other fellow, having nothing to pick us up on, said nothing the next morning. We said nothing the next afternoon. He said nothing the third morning. So it went for a week, two weeks, three weeks. Then the Sun came out with another blast. Old Poison Pen came raging in with another hot reply. Again it went into the waste basket, and again there was silence on our part.

A third time this happened. This last dig was particularly nasty and unfair, and also personal, but I still stuck to my plan of letting silence work for the Eagle. I'll admit it was hard to do, especially as I have the blood of two historic fighting races in my veins, but I gritted my teeth and held on. Then, one afternoon, two of Blanksburg's leading merchants called on me.

"We have come to tell you," they said, "that the business men of this city are more than pleased that you have refused to be drawn into taking part in dirty partisan politics. We know that the provocation to do so must have been pretty strong the past few weeks. We were afraid that it would prove too strong. We have come to thank you for keeping still. We are also going to tell you that after we leave here we shall call on the general manager of the Sun and tell him that in our opinion Blanksburg no longer wants mud-slinging in its papers, Republican or Democratic."

That was the first straw blown our way to show that we were on the right track. Pretty soon well known Democrats who had not taken the paper in years began walking into the business office and entering their subscriptions for the Eagle. Equally prominent Republicans began owning up that they liked "the new way" better than the old—that it was not only more decent, but they reckoned it was better politics after all, in the long run.

The real test of "the new way" came, however, when I ordered a circulation canvass along the line of the X. & D. Railroad south from Blanksburg, hidebound Democratic teritory ever since there had been a Democratic party. Republicans were so few and far between there that they were looked upon as curiosities.

"It will be money thrown away to canvass that territory for subscriptions," protested the circulation manager. "We have never been able to get any papers into it."

"That's so," I said. "But the Eagle then was calling those Democrats down Thorntown way everything it could think of, and I don't blame them for refusing to take it, even if it is the only evening paper that can reach them on the afternoon of publication. Now we have an Eagle that is decent even to intolerant Democrats. Go to it—let's see if it is appreciated."

The canvassers had so hard a time of it that I couldn't help feeling sorry for them. Not once, but hundreds of times, housewives would order the paper, only to have their orders cancelled by their husbands the next day via all but insulting messages delivered in person to the canvassers still working in the small communities or in writing to the head office. Several times, at general merchandise stores and other countryside lounging places, Eagle workers were pre-emptorily ordered out when they began talking the paper. And always the burden of the song against the Eagle was:

"We won't let a paper that's been so unfair to the Democrats for years come into our homes."

"Why," said one long-bearded, six-foot-three citizen by way of emphasis, "I'd jest as soon let a copperhead snake nest in my bed."

A truly lovely situation. But we kept pounding away. Our solicitors kept dinning into all the ears that would listen that this was a new Eagle they were offering. They dared their hearers to find anything in the paper that savored of its old intolerant political policy. They'd tear out the editorial page and asked that it be glanced over. They'd also tear out the comic page and say, "Well, if you won't look at the rest of the paper, here are some good laughs for you, anyway."

I have always suspected that it was the comics that got these deserving Democrats down Thorntown way first to tolerate us and then to give us about five hundred circulation that actually stuck. I have never believed that these subscribers had any faith at first in our statements that this paper we were offering them was a new Eagle, with all the old political bitterness left out. But when after several months they discovered this to be true, they talked about it among their friends, so that at last there came a time when the canvassers found themselves working under what might be called normal conditions and harvesting accordingly. Today the new Eagle has approximately two thousand paid-up circulation in this territory, whereas the old Eagle had considerably less than two hundred and most of that sadly in arrears.

In Blanksburg, when it was seen that we meant business with the new policy, we not only added readers, but advertising as well. Not all the so-called Democratic advertising came into the paper, but the bulk of it did. Thus, in a material way, what I may call the "be decent" policy has paid. But I think in a civic way, and in a spiritual way, it has paid even handsomer dividends. I know there is a kindlier political feeling in Blanksburg today than before this policy was inaugurated. I know that all the months I was in Blanksburg I could walk down Main street any day and give and receive a pleasant greeting from any man I met, no matter what his politics. To bring about good feeling—neighborliness—among the people it serves—is that not one of the highest functions of a newspaper?

Oh, yes, after months of effort to get our "goat" and make us reach in rage for the old mud hole, the other paper fell in line with the new order of things, and, while it still is staunchly Democratic, it strives to be as decent to the Republicans as the Eagle is to the Democrats. Selah!

Two Indianapolis Officials Charged with Corrupt Practices

After eight months of grand jury investigations, with bitter charges hurled indiscriminately and the names of high state and city officials bandied about in connection with alleged political fraud and corruption in Indiana, William H. Remy, prosecutor of Marion county, has filed affidavits in the Criminal Court at Indianapolis, charging Mayor John L. Duvall of Indianapolis with violation of the corrupt practices act and misstatement of fact in connection with contributions to his campaign fund, and City Controller William C. Buser with conspiring with the mayor.

The investigations were the direct result of wholesale charges broadcast last fall by Thomas H. Adams, editor and publisher of the Vincennes Commercial and head of the press probe committee of the Indiana Republican Editorial Association. His allegations, which gained nation-wide attention in the press, involved both state and city officials in what he termed "wholesale political fraud and corruption," especially in 1925.

Any state officials involved in the charges are let out by the statute of limitations, which limits the time during which charges can be prosecuted to two years after the commission of the act. Local officials, however, are not protected by this law.

WOULD PROTECT DEAD FROM THRILL WRITERS

Texas Bill Provides Jail Sentence for Publication of Sensational Stories Involving Former Public Figures

Representative A. P. C. Petsch of Gillespie County plans to seek passage in the Texas Legislature of a bill which would protect the names of dead persons from use by sensational writers, who, in some instances it is claimed, have capitalized upon the popularity of persons formerly in public life, by publishing stories of their private life.

Petsch, following a conference with Gov. Dan Moody regarding his proposed measure, said the executive had promised he would open way for its introduction by recommendation in a subsequent message to the legislature, now in special session, that such a measure be enacted. The present legislature, liberalized the Texas libel law by adopting amendments.

A draft of Petsch's proposed bill says: "Section 1. Whoever shall write, print, draw or otherwise publish anything which shall in any way or manner reflect upon the reputation or good name of a person deceased, or who shall possess for purpose of sale, or otherwise, any book, manuscript, drawing or publication, shall be guilty of a felony and, upon conviction, shall be punished by confinement in the penitentiary not less than one year nor more than 10 years. * * *

"Section 2. Provided that this law shall not apply to the records of a court made in the trial of a case, to the records made in a department of state in connection with the state business, books or treatises strictly and exclusively of historical nature and of interest to and for the advancement of the welfare of the public in general; and upon any trial for violation of this act the defendant shall be permitted to introduce the truth of the publication as evidence.

CITY SPRINGING UP AT PAPER MILL SITE

Contracts Let for $1,000,000 Hospital and Hotel at Kapuskasing, Ont., Kimberly-Clark—N. Y. Times Project

A regular city is springing up around the paper mill at Kapuskasing, Ont., of the Spruce Falls Power and Paper Company, Arthur H. Sulzberger, vice-president of the New York Times, declared this week before he left New York on a visit to the development.

His present trip, he said, was for the purpose of letting contracts for a new hotel and a hospital for employes, involving about $1,000,000.

The Spruce Falls Power and Paper Company is owned by the Kimberly-Clark Company and the New York Times. The falls are 50 miles from the transcontinental railroad, and already a private rail line has been built. At the end of the railroad the city is growing, and, according to Mr. Sulzberger, consists already of many dwelling houses, stores, and a school in addition to the mill, under process of construction.

It is expected that the first machines will go into operation in August, 1928.

ORDERS 68 PRESS UNITS

Chicago Daily News Places Big Contract with R. Hoe & Co.

Sixty-eight superspeed press units and 17 superspeed double folders have been bought by the Chicago Daily News from R. Hoe & Co., Inc., according to a Hoe announcement early this week. This is said to be the largest order ever placed for newspaper presses.

These new press units are intended for the new plant of the Daily News which is to be a block square building on the Chicago River at Madison and Washington streets.

The News purchased its first presses of R. Hoe & Co. in 1889 when eight 16-page units were ordered.

A touch of sentiment entered into the buying of the new equipment when it was suggested by Walter A. Strong, publisher, that some of the parts of these old Hoe machines be included in the first run or heat of metal to be used in casting the new press structures, thus perpetuating in the new presses the life of these old presses that have served the News so well and for so long a time.

HOLDS MEMORIAL SERVICES

N. Y. Sun Club Honors 14 Who Have Died Since F. A. Munsey

The Sun Club, an organization of the employes of the New York Sun held memorial services at noon on Friday, May 27, in the Sun Parlor at 280 Broadway, in honor of the men who had died since the death of Frank A. Munsey on Dec. 22, 1925.

Einar O. Petersen, president of the Sun Club, opened the ceremonies by introducing Fred A. Walker, chairman of the executive board of the Sun, who paid a tribute to the memory of Mr. Munsey, expressing admiration for the late publisher's character, his high ideals and his successful accomplishments.

Edwin S. Friendly, business manager of the Sun then read a list containing the names of 14 men who had died since Dec., 1925, while in the service of the organization. Mr. Friendly paid a fine tribute to the men, for their loyalty and long faithful service, for some of them had been in continuous employ of the Sun for nearly 40 years.

Mr. Friendly paid a brief eulogy to each man and after each name there was a short pause when a bell tolled in a nearby hallway, and after all the names had been read two buglers from the New York National Guard sounded taps and the echo was repeated by two other buglers stationed at a distance.

It is believed that this was the first time such memorial services were ever held in a newspaper organization.

ST. LOUIS DIPLOMA MILL FORCED TO CLOSE

Supreme Court Ruling Is Aftermath of St. Louis Star Exposé of 1923 —Florida Man Convicted Recently

(By Telegraph to Editor & Publisher)

St. Louis, Mo., May 26.—It was in 1923 that the St. Louis Star began the exposure of the operations of the national medical diploma mill ring, but the cleaning up process goes on. On May 23, the Missouri Supreme Court en banc, handed down a unanimous decision forfeiting the charter of the St. Louis College of Physicians and Surgeons, one of the institutions involved in the Star's exposé for the "unlawful traffic, barter and sale" of medical diplomas. A recent decision in a companion case revoked the charter of the Kansas City College of Medicine and Surgery.

Still another late development in the Star's campaign came in March with the conviction, in the Federal Court at Tampa, Fla., of Dr. George A. Munch, former secretary of the Florida Board of Medical Examiners, who was identified in the Star's exposé as a member of the ring. Munch, who trafficked in diplomas and in license to practice medicine in Florida, was sentenced to serve five years in the Atlanta Prison.

Another phase of the case will be reopened next month in Connecticut when a group of doctors, ousted from that State, will endeavor to have the revocation of their licenses set aside. Connecticut officials are vigorously opposing this effort.

The St. Louis College of Physicians and Surgeons, which must cease to operate. In the decision, Dr. Waldo Briggs, dean and owner of the college, was criticized for practices involving the admission to the college of unqualified students; for granting fraudulent advanced credits, and for the issuance of diplomas to unqualified persons.

Harry Thompson Brundidge, of the Star staff, who "went through the mill" in the summer of 1923 and came out "Dr. Harry Thompson, M.D.," has for the past 12 months been connected with the advertising department of the Star.

IOWA 14% ABOVE NEW CAR QUOTA

$70,000,000 a Year Spent for Education

714,744 CHILDREN IN PUBLIC SCHOOLS

Annual Expenditure Per Pupil Is $12 Above Average

Children living in Iowa have the privilege of education with an annual cost more than $12 above the average state expenditure, according to school census reports.

Throughout the United States, the average amount spent per pupil per year is $81.16. In Iowa, it is $107.24. Not only does Iowa spend more to educate each child, but it has nearly 200,000 more children in school than would be normally expected on a basis of state population.

The school census of the United States shows 19,132,451 children in school, or less than one for every five persons.

Yet in Iowa, with a population of two and one-half million, there are 714,744 children in school, or more than one to every four persons.

Complete school training is available throughout the state. Consolidated high schools provide farm children with advanced educational opportunities equal to those of children in the city.

Iowa's education system, providing instruction for over 30 per cent more children than would be expected from population averages, and spending an extra $12 every year on each pupil, is a fair example of advantageous living conditions in every part of the state.

Iowa Leads Nation in Literacy Percent

High literacy is one of the natural results of a progressive system of education, and Iowa's literacy percentage is 99.5, the highest in the United States.

In addition to its cultural advantages, literacy has a commercial value. It is important to the business man to know that practically every Iowa family takes a daily paper and that, excepting the one-half of one per cent, every member of the family can understand it.

In Iowa, no foreign language supplement is required by a schedule of daily newspaper advertising. In fact, daily newspapers provide the one printed medium for covering the state without any supplement whatever.

IOWA GROCERY BILL OVER $200,000,000

2,500 Rated Stores Provide Outlet For Food Products

Food products manufacturers may find a new measure of their own market in the figures on Iowa motor car ownership and gasoline consumption.

In the ownership of motor cars per capita, Iowa is rated among the first in the United States, with less than four persons per car.

Naturally Iowa has a large gasoline bill, estimated at $50,000,000.00 a year.

Turning the Tables

In order to get an idea of the Iowa market for food, just reverse the ratio. Since the average person requires more fuel, in dollars and cents, than the average automobile, $200,000,000.00 is a conservative estimate of the Iowa market for food products.

A state with $200,000,000.00 and more to spend every year at the grocery store, can provide business for any manufacturer who gets his product into Iowa's 2,500 rated grocery stores, and who backs it up with a thorough job of advertising.

LIVING CONDITIONS AID IOWA INDUSTRY

Improve Workmanship and Reduce Turnover in Labor

Superior living conditions have been a prominent factor in leading many companies to choose Iowa as the location for industrial plants, according to E. A. Kimball, Secretary of the Iowa Manufacturers Association.

"Transportation facilities, nearness to raw materials and to markets are fundamental points in selecting factory sites," said Mr. Kimball. "In fact many large factories have located in Iowa just to be near agricultural sources of raw material.

Vital with High-Grade Labor

"But there are other lines, particularly those requiring a high grade of labor and experienced workmanship, where Iowa living conditions have been the primary factor in location and successful development of industrial plants.

"Employees of Iowa factories have a chance to really live. Instead of raising their families in cramped metropolitan quarters, they can own their homes just as their employers do.

"Their children have the advantages of being educated in the progressive school system of the state, and of being raised in a wholesome environment with plenty of opportunity for healthful outdoor play.

Promotes Better Work

"Men living under conditions such as those do better work. Strikes are the rare exception. Labor turn-over is low and there is a closer understanding between employer and employee than would otherwise be possible."

STATE BUYS 12,000 MORE DURING 1926 THAN U. S. AVERAGE

State Automobile Registration Close to 700,000 Cars

FIFTY MILLIONS FOR GAS

Quarter-billion in Gallonage Required for Motor Fuel

Basing percentages on the sale of passenger automobiles throughout the United States, Iowa bought 14 per cent more than its quota during 1926, according to statistics compiled by the state automobile department.

Of the 3,950,000 new cars sold in the United States last year, Iowa bought 95,611. If purchases had been limited in strict proportion to population, the sales in Iowa would have been about 83,000.

Indicates Buying Power

Motor car buying is regarded by economists as a convincing index of purchasing power and buying habits.

Whether the customer pays cash or uses the installment plan, it takes money to buy an automobile. It requires a surplus income of about $300 a year to purchase even the lowest priced car on the "easiest" payments.

100,000 Used Car Sales

Automobile men point out that the total sales of new passenger cars for the year, do not give a complete story of Iowa automobile buying. In addition, there were about 100,000 sales of used automobiles.

These sales, combined with the new car sales, mean that more than 30 per cent of the families in the state actually purchased better motor cars during 1926 than they had previously owned.

$50,000,000 Gasoline Bill

"Iowa not only owns automobiles but uses them generously, regardless of the 2c per gallon tax on gasoline. During 1926 Iowans paid gasoline tax of $5,033,892.00 showing that the automobiles of the state consumed more than 250,000,000 gallons of gasoline," according to W. M. Colladay, superintendent of the state automobile department.

With the retail price of gasoline averaging around 20 cents a gallon, this means that Iowa's gasoline bill for 1926 is close to $50,000,000.00. A $50,000,000.00 annual expenditure for gasoline alone will be significant to the executive who wonders whether Iowa has money and spends it.

ADVERTISERS who understand the Iowa situation know from experience that the consumers' market there cannot be properly sold without the use of newspapers in these twenty-one key cities.

EVER CHANGING MASS MIND IS FORCING KEENER ADVERTISING TECHNIQUE

"Americans Today Governed by Clock and Pocketbook," Says Erie Speaker—Striking Copy and Carefully Planned Appeal Needed to Reap Sales

CHANGING conditions in American life make necessary constant revision in the rules governing successful advertising. This was the message emphasized repeatedly at the annual convention of the Advertising Affiliation, held last week-end in Erie, Pa. In attendance were 375 members of the advertising clubs bordering on Lake Erie and Lake Ontario, composing the affiliation.

In discussing the general convention subject, "Reaching Greater Markets", the speakers who had places on the two-day program repeatedly stressed the necessity of eliminating guesswork and old formulas from the modern advertising campaign. One of the most striking summaries of this thought was that of W. A. P. John, director of the copy department of the Campbell-Ewald Advertising Company of Detroit.

"This is a jazz-mad, pleasure-craving, gin-grabbing age", Mr. John declared in his address on the subject "Copy Lessons From the Automotive Industry". The newspaper advertiser of today is confronted by an ever-changing mass mind.

"The automotive industry has been responsible for some of the greatest advertising in industry. Out of its experience have come two great lessons. One is that this ever-changing mind of the American public must be reckoned as a paramount factor in the planning of any successful campaign.

"Americans today are governed by the clock and the pocketbook. Their high pressure living tends toward economic independence with a desire for all kinds of mental and physical diversions. To reach a population of this character advertising must have eye appeal, it must be short and colorful in style, and in superlatives, if necessary, tell just what the advertiser is trying to get across to his prospective customers.

"The second lesson we have learned from the automotive industry's advertising is that courage is rewarded in this field of merchandising. Automobile manufacturers have spent millions to get across a single, simple idea. It required courage to do it. Now the investment is being returned with generous interest."

Many of the speakers dwelt upon the advisability of selling thoroughly a home market before branching out into a state or national field. For this purpose the home newspaper is the ideal medium, it was pointed out. Charles W. Chabot, director of distribution of the Hammermill Paper Company, stressed this idea.

"Selling, like charity," said Mr. Chabot, "should begin at home. No product should be marketed on a national scale until it has obtained high repute and widespread circulation in its local territory. See your product through the eyes of your prospect. The sales imagination of this character turns defeat into victory in many campaigns."

Edgar J. Kaufmann of the Kaufmann Department Stores of Pittsburgh paid a high tribute to the value of the daily newspaper to the modern department store. He asserted that the next five years will be the period of the greatest test in history of department stores.

Upon arrival at the convention in the Hotel Lawrence the advertisers were welcomed by Mayor Joseph C. Williams of Erie. Charles Percy, president of the Affiliation, was in charge of the sessions. He announced that the Advertising clubs of Akron, Ohio, and Toronto, Ont., would be added to the Affiliation by the time its next convention is held.

Rochester was awarded the 1928 convention at the annual business meeting. It was decided to hold a mid-summer conference at one of the Canadian lake shore resorts. A. Hart Hopkins of Buffalo and Ross Clemens of Hamilton, Ont., were named to arrange the program.

Ludwig G. Meyer, president of the Erie (Pa.) Advertising Club, was elected president of the Affiliation. Ernest A. Paviour of Rochester was chosen first vice-president and general chairman for the 1928 convention. Ross Clemens of Hamilton, Ont., was elected second vice-president and J. Jay Fuller of Buffalo, secretary and treasurer.

Col. L. P. Ayers, vice-president of the Cleveland Trust Company, opened the convention with an address on "Business Factors That May Affect 1927 Marketing." Colonel Ayers declared that while the United States is prosperous, it is a new kind of prosperity, favoring one kind of business and being necessarily unkind to others. The trend of commodity prices, being downward, is to the disadvantage of dealers in staples, manufacturers and jobbers alike, he noted.

"The future of business prosperity is in no small measure up to its advertising men, who, at the moment, have one of the greatest opportunities of the age." he declared.

Truman A. DeWesse, director of publicity of the Shredded Wheat Company, outlined that company's advertising plans and program, saying "daily newspapers move the goods from the dealers' shelves."

Frank W. Hunt, advertising service, of Toronto, told of the necessity of addressing Canadian advertising to the farmers. T. E. Moser of Moser and Cotons, Utica, N. Y., discussed "Advertising to Industry," asserting that industrial advertising is good economics.

Progress Reported by Association National Advertisers in Campaig in Behalf of Discount Policy

Definite progress in its two-per cash discount campaign was reported week by the Association of National vertisers, through Arthur H. Ogle, se tary at New York headquarters.

"There are now only 156 dailies ou a total of 1,840, exclusive of Sunday combinations, which do not give cash counts," Mr. Ogle said.

"During the 12 months from A 1926, to April, 1927, 38 reinstated discounts, while only five went the o way. To the 38 were added the Cu Martin Newspapers, which last week instated the 2 per cent cash disc policy."

The A. N. A. executive committee meet in New York either June 16 or J 23 to make plans for continuing the ferences with other advertising intere which is part of the association's prog of co-operation. The first conference the sort was held with newspaper exe tives in New York early this year. Ogle said there might be another con ence with newspaper men this fall. N on the schedule, however, are confere with farm paper publishers and outd advertisers.

New York City, N.Y.

Dear Mr. Bickel:-

I have just wired you as follows:-

"HEARTY CONGRATULATIONS ON UNITED PRESS HANDLING OF LINDBERGH STORY STOP ON STREET WITH EXTRA ANNOUNCING COMPLETION OF FLIGHT EIGHT MINUTES AHEAD OF COMPETITION"

In addition to being first on the street with the news that Lindbergh had landed, The Star did not get off wrong on the Nungesser flight, thanks to the accuracy of United Press in these two events.

Our principal competitor had Nungesser sighted off Cape Race, passing Portland Maine and passing Boston in three different editions, while The Star stuck to the facts that no trace of the intrepid French airmen had been found.

In a page ad on the Nungesser-Coli achievement, St. Louis Star stated in part "Just as The St. Louis Star has already established itself as the only St. Louis newspaper that can ALWAYS be relied upon to take the part of the public in any public question, it is now rapidly becoming known as the one St. Louis newspeper that can be relied upon to inform the public in any great news event and with proper poise and judgment". The Lindbergh flight news would seem to be additional proof of that statement.

Very truly yours,

Elzey Roberts

TAKES 3,000 FOOT PARACHUTE LEAP TO DELIVER DERBY PICTURES TO DAILY

Paul A. DeWeese, parachute jumper

FORTY-TWO minutes after the spectacular finish at Churchill Downs, Louisville, where Whiskery won the Kentucky Derby by a head, a parachute jumper landed at Makatewah Golf Club ground, Cincinnati, bearing photographic films of the race taken from the air.

Fifteen minutes later the pictures had been developed at the office of the Cincinnati Enquirer and were ready for the first page layout of the Sunday paper. It is believed to be the first time pictures have been delivered via the parachute route.

The special airplane of the Enquirer was chartered for the occasion and was driven from Cincinnati to the Downs Saturday afternoon against a baffling headwind and through a succession of showers by Major Hugh Watson of Watson Airport, Cincinnati. With him were Parks Watson, aerial photographer, and Paul A. DeWeese, parachute jumper. The return trip from Louisville was made at an average speed of 150 miles an hour and on arrival at the Makatewah Club grounds DeWeese lost no time in walking out upon the wing of the plane to make his death-defying leap of 3,000 feet. DeWeese was photographed as he landed enmeshed in the silken folds of his parachute and his picture is shown herewith. He has a record of making more than 200 similar leaps, but this is the first time that he carried newspaper photographs. The distance of the airplane drive is about 150 miles in each direction from Cincinnati to Louisville, and the round trip was made in a non-stop flight. Arrangements for the special airplane service were made by W. F. Wiley, general manager of the Enquirer.

ATTORNEY CONFESSES ERROR

His Statement Included in Brief Filed in Behalf of Editor Dale

A written confession of error in a case involving George R. Dale, editor of the Muncie (Ind.) Post Democrat, was included in a brief filed recently in the Indiana Supreme court at Indianapolis by Thomas V. Miller, attorney for Dale.

The brief, filed in a criminal contempt case brought by Raymond Warner of Muncie against Dale, in which the editor is charged with criminal libel, is said to be the first ever filed in which a written confession of error has been included. The confession of error, made by Joe H. Davis, prosecuting attorney of Delaware county, to Judge Clarence W. Dearth of the Delaware Circuit court, was overruled and Miller included the written confession of error in his brief.

Dale was found guilty in the lower court and sentenced to 90 days at the Indiana state farm and fined $400. In the confession of error, Davis, who prosecuted Dale and whose confession of error would ordinarily have meant dismissal of the case, alleged that the jury which heard the case was prejudiced and cites examples.

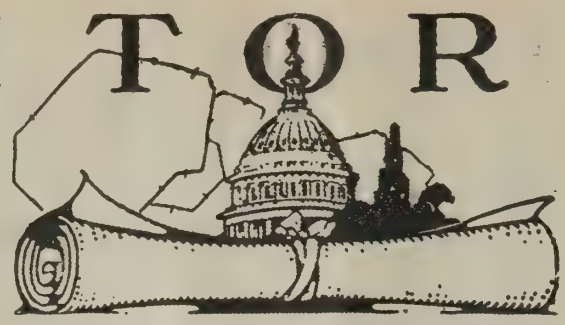
EDITORIAL

VITAL INVISIBLES

WHAT is a newspaper worth?

When that question was put to a publisher who has bought and sold many newspapers in his career, his reply was that of the Yankee: "How long is a piece of string? How wide is a chalk-mark?" Which were as intelligent answers as could be returned to the question as phrased.

Rule-of-thumb units for calculating the good-will value of newspapers have been put forward often in recent years and their basis has been altered, steadily upward, as newspapers have demonstrated from year to year their power to increase earnings that ten years ago were beyond the wildest dreams of most proprietors. The situation now is that circulation is worth $10, $12, $20, $25, $30 per subscriber or whatever figure your particular expert has taken for his own. The right answer is that none of them can be made to apply by analogy from one newspaper to another. Every newspaper property that is worth buying has some individual tie to its community that sets it apart from its competition and from every other newspaper in the land and which contributes something which is not only reflected in present earnings but is also a guarantee that those earnings will continue and increase. It is invisible to the casual student of balance sheets, but it is ever-present to the owners and executives and the price that their newspaper brings depends not a little upon their ability to demonstrate to the buyer the existence of this unseen, unweighable relation without which the pursuit of happiness and prosperity is a hopeless stern chase.



To draw firm conclusions as to circulation values from the sales of several great newspapers last week, and the prices reported paid for them, is dangerous for either prospective buyer or receptive seller of a newspaper. A valuation of $25 per subscriber may seem tremendous as a basis for estimating good-will; a few years ago it would have been fantastic. Yet that figure and more appears to have been the basis of agreement in several important sales in recent years and the results in subsequent net revenues have validated the estimate. In other cases, well known to newspapermen, a value of $25 or $30 per subscriber for a newspaper's good-will would be tantamount to destruction of that item on the balance sheet. This applies in small city fields even more than in metropolitan centres. Even in this day of mass circulation, a small select group of devoted readers may easily possess a higher unit value than the circulation which is written in six figures, as demonstrated by its power to produce the results that advertisers desire.

A newspaper's history, its management, its methods of gathering, distributing and commenting upon the news of its field, its record of enterprise, and its errors and failures are all just as essential to a true valuation as an accurate statement of earnings and net paid circulation. The wise buyer and seller will not be led into error by stories of what others have bought and sold, paid and been paid. Their principal task is to find out what has been done and what can be done with the property under their eyes and to fix their values accordingly.

Hats off to the genius press agent who gets real money for "bright ideas" that any stenographer in the employ of the "come-on" advertiser would recognize as just another treasury leak.

TIME WASTERS

IN a four-column, second-day story of Lindbergh's adventures in Paris, made up of "new leads," "inserts," "adds," "bulletins" and "sub-bulletins," the simple fact that the aviator was the first to make an unassisted non-stop hop between New York and Paris was repeated seven times and there was monotonous repetition of other well-known facts. These statements looked good when the bulletins, new leads, inserts and adds were written, but when they were hooked-up in a running story and allowed to stand in a late edition, they must have seemed absurd to the average reader. Of course, it is up to the telegraph editor to prepare such copy so that the story will run smoothly and without tiresome repetition. We all resent being told what we already know. Newspaper readers do not take kindly to stories that merely waste time.

But the path of the just is as the shining light, that shineth more and more unto the perfect day.—Proverbs, IV; 18.

TIPS FOR YOUNGSTERS

WHAT do you say to aspiring youth when it presents itself at your desk and asks for a chart to successful publishing? Every day in every office these candidates for careers appear. What is the magic secret? How can they launch a seaworthy craft on the ocean of printer's ink? What would you advise? Where is the best field? How much capital is needed? Is there any going publication that needs new blood? Every newspaper executive is familiar with the type.

There are three classifications that include all such candidates: (1) Men who possess sufficient capital to launch or buy an enterprise; (2) Men who are without capital and without recognized genius and must sell their services and bore upward from within; (3) Men who possess no capital but display such unusual brilliancy as to be able to make demands upon capital.

The capitalist in this day and age in the publishing field pays not only for tangible assets, but for opportunity. Never have newspaper properties brought such high prices as at present. When one thinks about purchasing a daily, even in one of the smaller cities, he must estimate in six and sometimes even seven figures. Publishing expense is today at its peak, and operating capital must not be underestimated. Money in bank is the only capital that will adequately serve the purposes of a new venture. Buying into the daily or prosperous weekly field is a financial undertaking that calls for very practical and thoroughly experienced talent. There are no miracles. There is no magic lamp. It is just hard, cold business.

The usual candidate for a career tells you that he has no capital but is prepared to work faithfully and well. All he seeks is the opportunity. He knows that if given a chance he can win for himself and the fortunate publisher who engages his services. He is sincere. He wants a job and if he makes fame or fortune or both, very rapidly, for his employer he may be taken into partnership or given a share of the profits or be permitted to buy stock in the corporation.

Good advertising is advertising that pays a good dividend on the investment.

AID TOM WALLACE'S FIGHT

THE Cumberland Falls of Kentucky, surrounded by a wooded wilderness, are by many tourists held as the most beautiful cataract in Eastern America, except the incomparable Niagara. For more than a year Tom Wallace has been sending out alarms in the Louisville Times that a Chicago power company was about to lay ruinous hands upon this natural wonder.

A mutual friend writes EDITOR & PUBLISHER: "Despite the fact that Mr. Wallace has shown that the economic value of the Falls as scenery is far greater than would be their economic value as a power site, the danger of their despoliation still exists and nothing can head it off but public opinion. It would be a magnificent thing if newspaper men who believe in the conservation of such natural beauty would assist Mr. Wallace in his campaign by sending protests to the Federal Power Commission, care of O. C. Merrill, secretary, or to the Secretaries of War, Agriculture or the Interior, who are members of the Commission, or ask a friendly Congressman or Senator to aid Tom Wallace and the Louisville Times to save that noble cataract from ruinous exploitation at the hands of a power company."

MORE LIVES THAN ONE

HE who reads the modern newspaper lives more lives than one and more deaths than one must die. To all intents and purposes, the American people hopped off from Roosevelt Field at 7:55 a. m. of a recent morning and sailed the air, 10,000 feet in the clouds or skimming the waters of the Atlantic, passed over Ireland, England, the Channel and up the Seine to a place where beacons were flaring, alighted, was carried off the field on men's backs, slept ten hours, visited and comforted a sorrowing mother and then saw the sights of gay Paree. Lindbergh set a breathless pace for the imagination of the reading world. Modern communications service made this flight so vivid to the people that the lowliest individual of the back country was given opportunity to share its magnificent thrills. The grand experience of living outside of the borders of one's own monotonous field of interest is real to this generation. Life to our grandparents was made up very largely of the visible and audible present. To us, the whole world daily reels by on a screen.

Two weeks ago we suffered tortures of suspense for the lost French fliers, as if they were members of our own immediate circle of friends. When hope for them was lost, we felt pangs of personal bereavement. As we died with Nungesser and Coli, we now live with Lindbergh. It is perhaps the greatest contribution of the press of this day that it transmits to the commonplace many the experiences of the diverting few.

Phil Payne says that highly jazzed "sex" stories are no longer wanted, the public now preferring "soft moonlight in the garden." That's encouraging.

WHEN HEARST SIGNED BRISBANE

WRITING interestingly in the New Yorker, John K. Winkler presumes to tell the real story of how Arthur Brisbane happened to ally himself with William Randolph Hearst. In the year 1896 Brisbane was in temporary charge of Joseph Pulitzer's Evening World. Mr. Hearst was just beginning to project his ambitions for New York Evening Journal. Brisbane was unhappy because Mr. Pulitzer had by cable killed a column of signed editorial comment that Brisbane had started on page one of the Evening World. He chanced to meet Mr. Hearst at the Cafe Martin. Mr. Winkler writes that Mr. Hearst immediately asked Brisbane to join him and that the salary was to be $200 per week, equalling the World's offering, plus $1 per week for each one thousand of circulation that the Journal would gain under Brisbane's editorship. During the Spanish-American war the Evening Journal's circulation leaped to more than a million and Mr. Brisbane's $200 per week salary grew to $50,000 per year.

These may be the facts, but we have heard Brisbane tell the story of his first interview with Hearst and in his version he and not Mr. Hearst was the aggressor. His own story was: "After I had conversed for a short time with Mr. Hearst I was convinced that he was destined to be the greatest publisher New York had ever seen. I believed that he would revolutionize the newspaper business of this country. He knew what he was about and I determined to sell my services to him. This was my argument: 'If a dozen people were seated at this table and I were at the head I will promise you that I would be able to make at least ten of the dozen face in my direction and listen to what I had to say. I shall command their interest. In some such proportion as that I can attract public interest to your newspaper. I shall command and hold the interest of a considerable proportion of the reading public.' Mr. Hearst listened and believed me. He gave me the editorship of the New York Evening Journal."

One of Lindbergh's charms is his use of the editorial "we," referring to himself and his plane. F. P. A., however, says it is "old stuff," as he has long written "we," meaning himself and the linotype.

EDITOR AND PUBLISHER

R. Hoe & Company, Inc.,
504-520 Grand Street,
New York City

Gentlemen:

I have noticed the recent letters from publishers of the Hartford Times and Scranton Times expressing their satisfaction with your presses. I want to add my word of praise to what they have written.

After two years of steady use on both morning and evening editions, we are in a position to judge the real worth of our Hoe Super-Speed Octuple. It has earned a name around the plan of "Old Reliable" because we have never had a moment's delay due to mechanical defects since the first few weeks of adjustment.

Since we first installed this press, our circulation has doubled. When we are running single plate runs, which is at least twice a week, we have to force the press to its utmost to keep up with the Circulation Department. But it has stood up under this hard usage wonderfully and is today running sweeter than ever.

I can back up the endorsement of the other publishers as being none too strong.

Yours sincerely,

COURIER-POST
J. David Stern
Editor and Publisher.

A circulation doubled in two years reflects aggressive leadership—and puts a searching test on mechanical equipment. Commendation under such circumstances is obviously significant.

ANOTHER Hoe press user adds his words of satisfaction to those already received.

Through two years of steady use on both morning and evening editions the Hoe Super-speed Press of the Camden Evening Courier-Morning Post has earned the name of "Old Reliable." This press has withstood steady and hard usage without a moment's delay from mechanical defects and today is running sweeter than ever.

Postum Company Increases Newspaper Appropriation—White Company's House Organ Gets Out National Advertiser's Number—Victor Sales Increase

MORE money will be spent this year in newspapers than in 1926 by the Postum Company, Inc., Young & Rubicam, the agency handling the account, announced this week. This company is the world's leading advertiser of grocery store products, manufacturing Post Toasties, Grape-Nuts, Post's Bran Flakes, Postum Cereal, Instant Postum, Jell-O, Swans Down Cake Flower and Minute Tapioca.

Last year Postum was one of the leading users of newspaper space. While figures for 1927 were not available, officials of the Postum Company believe this year they will rank among the first five.

The Postum Company have always devoted a large proportion of their advertising budget on Post Toasties, the double-crisp corn flakes, and Post's Bran Flakes to newspapers; and it is reported that these products will be fortified in 1927 with even more extensive newspaper campaigns than in the past. Extensive campaigns are also planned for Postum Cereal and Instant Postum, as well as Swans Down Cake Flour. Magazines and farm papers will also be used.

One of the newest of the Post Health Products, Post's Wheat Meal, is being advertised exclusively in newspapers. No other form of space advertising is scheduled for this product this year. While the campaign for Post's Wheat Meal has not yet reached national proportions, it is widely represented in four important sections of the country.

The White Company, makers of White Trucks and Buses, has issued its house-organ, the Albatross, this quarter as a National Advertiser's Number. It lists 77 companies that are owners of more than 9,000 White trucks and buses.

"In this number there is a natural emphasis upon the importance of motor transportation in the national distribution of products of every description," Stanley P. Seward, advertising manager, explained. "Coupled with it is the significance of advertising in all phases of sales effort and distribution, including the valuable use so often made of the truck or bus to carry a public message definitely hooked up with national advertising."

Sales of the Victor Talking Machine Company for the first quarter show an increase of $1,082,637 over the same period in 1926. In a statement issued this week, total sales amount to $10,213,019, compared with $9,130,382. Profits before depreciation and Federal taxes amount to $1,442,581, compared with $1,415,402.

A newspaper campaign is being planned by the Columbia Pictures Corporation, placed through the Capehart-Carey Corporation, New York.

Meeting at their semi-annual session, the India Tea Growers Cess Committee voted to raise $170,000 for advertising in the United States.

Paint and varnish advertising and sales managers are now organized under one association, known as the Paint and Varnish Advertising and Sales Managers Conference. Granville M. Breinig, Breinig Brothers, Inc., is chairman, and William R. McComb, business manager of the "Save the Surface" campaign, is secretary.

Dr. Paul H. Nystrom, recently professor of marketing at Columbia University, New York, has been appointed vice-president of Congoleum-Nairn, Inc., in charge of merchandising the company's products.

REPRESENTING THE NEWSPAPERS

Why Publishers Need Special Representation Told by Gertrude Byrne—Flowers Named Chairman of 'Frisco Group—Taylor & McMichael Start New Business

REASONS why publishers need special representatives were listed by Gertrude Byrne, secretary of the Newspaper Representatives Association of Chicago, addressing the convention of the Inland Daily Press Association.

"From my observation the principle of national advertising representation has proved sound and profitable," she said. "Its effects is far reaching and means more than just the additional linage and the dollars and cents derived.

"It means that someone is always selling your town and your paper. You are being established securely in the minds of advertisers and agencies in a personal way that correspondence can never do.

"If you would only familiarize yourself with the methods of representations as practiced, you would realize that you could not do without it. Why can't you regard your special representative as a part of your newspaper organization. You are too prone to look upon him as an outsider, one whom you have had to hire to help with the work, not one who can be brought into the family, as it were."

W. B. Flowers has been elected chairman of the Publishers Representatives Departmental of the San Francisco Advertising Club. Roger Johnstone was appointed first vice-chairman. Fred Hall, second vice-chairman; G. Frank MacDermott, secretary and treasurer, and Dave Sandeberg, publicity director.

Taylor & McMichael, formerly of the New York World, have opened up their own office as special representatives at 17 E. 45th street, New York.

Gilman, Nicholl & Ruthman this week announced they have resigned as national advertising representatives of the New Haven Journal-Courier, effective June 1.

Simon A. Baldus of Chicago was re-elected president of the Catholic Press Association of the United States and Canada at the annual meeting held in Savannah, Ga., May 19-21. The delegates were welcomed to Savannah by Pleasant A. Stovall, publisher of the Savannah Press.

is Washington (D. C.) the city, plus a 25 mile radius into Maryland and Virginia

The more than 750,000 people living within this area depend upon Washington as their center of supply. It is a market that isn't divided with any other city. It belongs to Washington — and, like Washington, the prosperous people are potential customers for the luxuries as well as the commodities of life.

It is a market that is easily cultivated because you need only ONE newspaper. The Star—Evening and Sunday—maintains a regular, direct carrier service right into the homes that make up this market. That simplifies your promotion problem—and economically, too.

BUILDING NEWSPAPER CIRCULATION

Newsboy Trial Board in Boston and How the System Works—Cleveland Circulation War Ends—Worcester Telegram-Gazette Drives 14 Autos 34,000 Miles in Month Without Accident

A UNIQUE feature of the Boston newsboy system is the Newsboy Trial Board, which handles usually about 500 cases a year. It serves not only as an agent for enforcing the law, but at the same time instructs the child and parent, thus helping and protecting the child. It usually does away with the necessity of bringing street-trade offenders to the juvenile court.

In Boston the Board was established by the school committee. It consists of a man appointed by the school committee as supervisor of licensed minors, who, on the trial board, acts as prosecuting attorney, one of the attendance officers, who acts as the adult judge, and three newsboy judges.

The newsboy judges are elected from the licensed boys attending the public schools, only boys holding badges being entitled to vote. The clerk of the Trial Board is chosen by the boy judges. The newsboy judges and the clerk receive a compensation of 75 cents for each meeting of the board.

The circulation war long waged by Cleveland newspapers has ended in an agreement signed this week by the publishers, which sets the edition times and bans heavy expenditures in contests and premiums.

With its issue of May 30, the Cleveland Plain Dealer discontinued its early evening "bull dog" edition placed on sale at 8:30 P. M. Now the first edition of the Plain Dealer will be on the street at 10:40. The Cleveland Press has discontinued its early morning edition which used to be out at 5 A. M. and the News has stopped its 7 o'clock in the morning edition. Both these afternoon papers are now on the street at 9 A. M.

Fourteen automobiles, the Worcester (Mass.) Telegram Gazette fleet, were driven for a total of 34,000 miles in April without an accident, and the newspaper was declared a winner in the safety contest being conducted by the Chamber of Commerce. Several hundred industrial and commercial firms were entered in the competition.

Beauty contests are not what they used to be as circulation builders in the opinion of Pete Bloom, circulation manager of the New York Daily Mirror, expressed in an interview with EDITOR & PUBLISHER this week.

And Mr. Bloom made his statement on the day that Dorothy Britton, the "Miss New York" selected by the Mirror, was crowned "Miss America" at the Galveston, Tex., beauty pageant.

Mr. Bloom dates the decline in beauty contests as a whirl-wind circulation getter to the so-called Atlantic City exposé.

The Cleveland (O.) Press, is raising a fund of $5,000 to send the members of the East High School band, that city, to the international high school band contest in Council Bluffs, Ia., the last week in May.

Oklahoma City police courts have had numerous cases lately dealing with the recent ruling requiring newsboys to announce only the name of their papers in "conversational tones" or pay a fine. The ruling applies only to certain areas. The ordinance provides, however, that in case of a special edition contents of the paper may be called.

In order to determine how extensively the Charlotte (N. C.) Observer is read, the paper has had a staff photographer weekly for several months make a snapshop of a baby or small child, when possible when the child is playing about by himself, with no observers in the way of nurses and parents. The picture is printed without a title every Sunday morning, and the paper has offered a standing prize of $5 to each parent or guardian who will identify the picture and bring the child as evidence. Every picture published has been promptly identified.

The Chicago Evening American will award $1,000 in prizes in a new contest linked with "Shackled Souls," a story by Elenore Meherin, author of "Chickie." With the serial, the Evening American prints a brief description of one character daily, along with a list of possible movie actresses or actors who might play the part for the films. The readers are asked to make up their ideal cast for the story, giving a first, second and third choice for each part.

De Lisle Crawford, a 17-year-old senior of Oak Park and River Forest High School, won the title of champion high school orator of Illinois, which carried with it a $500 scholarship and a summer tour of Europe, in the national oratorical contest being sponsored in Illinois by the Chicago Daily News.

ADVERTISING AGENCY AFFAIRS

Campbell-Ewald's Playwright Has Turned Out a New One—Rosebrook Joins Young & Rubicam's Copy Department—Herbert Peron Leaves Chicago Tribune for Agency Work

JOSEPH H. NEEBE, a member of the Campbell-Ewald Company Executive Staff, is the author of a farce comedy entitled "The Lucky Son of a Bishop." which is now in rehearsal under the management of A. G. Wilkes, Los Angeles producer, who plans to open it in that city in June. Wilkes is one of the theatre-smart men in the western playhouses. It was he who musicalized "Uncle Tom's Cabin" for the saucy Duncans, and made a fortune out of "Topsy and Eva," and it was the same he who cashed in on that amusing play, "The Nervous Wreck."

J. B. Rosebrook, formerly with the Ralph H. Jones Company, advertising agency, of Cincinnati, has joined the copy department of Young & Rubicam, New York and Philadelphia.

William S. Nordberg of the William H. Rankin Company, Chicago office, has been elected president of the Indian Hill Improvement Association of Winnetka, Ill., widely known as America's model suburb.

Allen-Jennings, Inc., of Lynchburg, Va., has been chartered by the state corporation commission to conduct an advertising agency in all its branches. Capital stock is $2,000 to $25,000. Officers are Edward A. Allen, president; Clyde Jennings, secretary, and T. J. Powell, all of Lynchburg.

A Herbert Peron, copywriter, formerly of the Chicago Tribune, has joined the staff of the Chicago office of the Capehart-Carey Corporation.

The Harry M. Frost Company, advertising agency of Boston and Lynn, Mass., has moved its main offices from 101 Tremont street, Boston, to the Metropolitan Theater building, 260 Tremont street, Boston. This change was made necessary to keep pace with the expanding needs of the business.

Mail Pilot Files Entry for Paris Flight; C. A. Lindbergh Will Fly a Ryan Monoplane

WASHINGTON, Feb. 28.—Formal entry for the Orteig prize of $25,000 offered for the first non-stop transatlantic flight between New York and Paris was filed with the National Aeronautic Association here today by Charles A. Lindberch of St. Louis, Mo., who will pilot a Ryan monoplane.

This is the second formal entry for the flight, a previous one having been made by Lieut. Commander Noel Davis.

Lindbergh is an air mail pilot and flies between St. Louis and Chicago. Twice within the latter part of 1926 he narrowly escaped with his life and was forced to make parachute descents, abandoning his plane in a fog at night when the motor failed him.

The first accident occurred Sept 16 while en route from Lambert, St. Louis Field, to Chicago, when the engine died in a fog at an altitude of about 5,000; the second occurred under similar circumstances on the same journey the night of Nov. 3 at an altitude of 13,000 feet.

In filing his entry today Lindbergh stated that he would use a Ryan monoplane equipped with Wright J-5 Whirlwind engines. The plane is understood to be under construction on the Pacific Coast.

The entry was accompanied with a certified check for $250, as required in accordance with the regulations for the contest. Lindbergh would now be able to make a start any time after April 25, as the regulations specify the entry must be filed sixty days prior to the start of the flight.

Commander Richard E. Byrd and Floyd Bennett are also understood to be planning to enter the contest for the Orteig Prize.

It is also understood that Captain Rene Fonck, the French ace, who made an unsuccessful attempt last Autumn, will make another attempt in the Spring, and that a new Sikorsky plane is being built for him and will be ready about May 1.

"The above story was supplied exclusively to newspaper client of the Capital City News Association, in its service of February 28."

"The service of the Capital City News Association covers the principal executive departments of the government including the White House, State, War and Navy Departments, U. S. Shipping Board, Embassies and Legations.

It constitutes a complete protective service within the territory it covers besides furnishing a large proportion of exclusive material.

The service is either delivered to Washington Bureaus or sent direct to newspapers by wire collect."

It averages 2500 to 3000 words daily and a summary of 500 words or any length above may be obtained.

"BOB" SMALL, NOTED NEWSPAPER MAN DIES SUDDENLY IN WASHINGTON

Veteran of 30 Years' Reporting Succumbs to Heart Attack in Sleep—Covered "Big News" Wherever It Broke—At British Front During War

By J. BART CAMPBELL

ROBERT T. "Bob" SMALL, a great reporter and a fine gentleman, is sleeping his last sleep.

Death overtook Small in bed at the

Robert T. Small

Arlington Hotel, Washington, on Sunday while he was asleep. A maid found him at midday with his left arm resting across his forehead. Believing him sound in slumber she departed. Returning several hours later she became alarmed when she observed his position was unchanged. A physician was summoned. He announced Small had slept away the sudden end of an active life, the result of a heart attack. For two years Small had been a sufferer from heart disease.

To the last, Small, dying at the age of 49 after an uninterrupted newspaper career of 30 years, remained absorbed in the big news event of the day. Across his bed and scattered near it were the first pages of Sunday newspapers carrying the dramatic trans-oceanic flight of Charles Lindbergh. The last time Small was seen alive was about 11 o'clock Sunday morning as he made his way to his room with an armful of newspapers. He was served with breakfast not long before. After reading the cabled accounts of Lindbergh's arrival at Paris, Small evidently fell in his final sleep.

Thousands of miles away were his wife and three daughters, who were still at Honolulu where he left them when he recently visited the Hawaiian Islands with them. Beside them he is survived by his father, Rev. Sam Small, noted evangelist and old-time newspaper man whose home is at Clarendon, Va., and a brother, Sam Small, Jr., also a newspaper man, now at Pasadena, Cal.

Mrs. Small and her children left Honolulu Wednesday aboard the steamship Matsonia to return to Washington.

The funeral was held Tuesday. Services were conducted at the New Jerusalem (Swedenborgian) Church here. The pallbearers were David Lawrence, head of the Consolidated Press Association, for which Small was a special writer for several years until his death; Robert B. McClean, H. R. Baukhage, James L. Bray and Horace Epes, others of his Consolidated associates; C. G. Marshall, chief of the news staff of the United States Daily; Royal D. Mead, a personal friend, and W. H. (Tommy) Atkins, secretary of the National Press Club. Many members of the National Press Club and of the Gridiron Club, deeply feeling the loss of a dear friend and close associate, were in attendance.

A special committee to represent the National Press Club was appointed by Louis Ludlow, president of the club, to which Small belonged. They were Robert Barry, Frank P. Morse, Graham Nichol, Thomas R. Shipp, W. H. Atkins, C. G. Marshall, Norman W. Baxter, Samuel W. Bell, Avery Marks, David Lawrence, Byron Price, Frank B. Lord, G. Gould Lincoln, Carl D. Ruth and George Authier.

Members of the Overseas Writers organization, of which Small was a member, were also in attendance.

Chief Justice William Howard Taft, a warm personal friend of Small both during and since his occupancy of the White House, was present. Others conspicuous in official life at the National Capital were there to pay final tribute to the newspaper man they so well liked and respected. Floral tributes were numerous.

"Few men have gained the place that Bob Small, as he was familiarly known to his colleagues from coast to coast, held not only in the esteem but the affection of the newspaper world," was the tribute paid by David Lawrence. "He was personally popular as were his writings. He could write a dispatch on national politics which would command attention and he could stir the emotions of his readers equally by a story of a prize fight or a football game or a derby. He was adept at personality sketches and could write a murder trial with the freshness of touch of a young reporter and all the maturity of a veteran hardened to the vicissitudes of crime news. Wherever the 'big story' happened to be, Bob Small went. He had recently traveled from coast to coast. He was well known not alone in newspaper circles but among public men the country over."

"He was a great reporter, which is the highest rung of journalism," wired Marvin H. Creager, managing editor of the Milwaukee Journal.

"Greatly shocked and greatly grieved," was the message sent by Morton H. Milford, editor of the Miami Daily News.

James M. Thomson, publisher of the New Orleans Item-Tribune, who worked with Small on the Washington Post in 1898, telegraphed:

"Never in Bob Small's great and useful life was he doing a greater service to his craft and country than in writing the series of Consolidated Press articles on the Mississippi flood situation. The reason for this was because of the ability of a trained interpreter of news in a vitally important situation to get the underlying facts and present them understandably and readably to the public."

Besides the Mississippi flood story, some of Small's important assignments as a special writer for the Consolidated in recent months were the Snyder-Gray and the Hall-Mills trials.

Small literally grew up in a newspaper office. He started his career on the Atlanta Constitution when his father was an editorial contemporary of Henry W. Grady and Joel Chandler Harris.

Although he spent most of his life in Washington, Small traveled many times all over the United States and Europe, with occasional trips to Central and South America. For two years he was at the front in the World War, having been with the British armies in France 12 months before the first Americans arrived overseas.

He spent 14 years with the Associated Press, and was known in virtually every newspaper office in the United States despite the fact that Associated Press writers never were permitted then to sign their dispatches. Small became known through the fact that editors so frequently inquired of the central and divisional offices of the "A. P." as to the identity of the writer of the various dispatches which had attracted their own attention and that of their readers.

Melville E. Stone, for so many years the general manager of the Associated Press, once designated Small as one of the four or five graphic news writers of America and it was under the personal direction of Stone that Small was sent month after month and year after year to wherever the "big story" of the day was "breaking."

In his long career, Small was in touch with nearly every big news event and every big personality of the last quarter of a century. His reportorial experience and acquaintance were world wide, while on the executive side of newspaper work he served for four years as superintendent of the southern division of the Associated Press and as acting managing editor of the Washington Post.

The absolute fairness of his writings and the unvarying clarity of his point of view won for Small an enviable reputation not only in his own fraternity but among the public men with whom he came in contact. As a correspondent Small not only had the necessary background and knowledge of a long experience, but a personality as well, and the ability quickly to gain the confidence of those with whom he came in contact. Small was not a partisan. He travelled with and enjoyed the confidence of Presidents Roosevelt, Taft, Wilson and Harding. In the campaign of 1920 he reported Governor Cox's tour of the country and while he frankly foretold Democratic defeat his dispatches were universally praised by Democrats for their qualities of fairness and sympathetic treatment.

Small's dispatches from Washington forecast the imperial conferences held in London in the summer of 1921—conferences which have changed for all time the character of the British Empire in its relationship with the dominions.

Small met Mr. Bryan on his return to this country in 1906, and in the same year covered the first gubernatorial campaign of Charles E. Hughes. Small covered the famous Thaw trial in New York, and the Haywood-Moyer-Pettibone trials in Boise, Idaho. He wrote the vivid description of the departure of the American battleship fleet on its trip around the world. His story was of such striking merit that the Associated Press broke a life-long precedent and sent a note on its wires telling editors that Small was the author of the classic they were inquiring about.

It was Small who first wrote of the split in the G. O. P. and the birth of the Progressive Party in 1912.

It was Small who covered the first convention of the Progressives and who, with the exception of 1916, when he was in Europe, covered every national political convention of the two great parties during many years.

In 1916 he succeeded Frederick Palmer as the official American correspondent at the British battle-front in France, where he was stationed with Philip Gibbs, Percival Gibbon and other noted correspondents. Small wrote some of the most brilliant accounts of the later Somme offensives and the operations at Vimy Ridge and Arras.

In 1917 he met General Pershing when the latter stepped ashore in France. Small covered the American Expeditionary Forces until his return to America in 1918, when he became head of the Washington bureau of the Philadelphia Public Ledger. In the fall of 1920 he joined the Consolidated Press Association.

Mrs. Small was Miss Ethel Sigsbee, a daughter of Admiral Sigsbee, the "Hero of the Maine."

C. P. WIRES SILENCED IN TRIBUTE TO SMALL

IN tribute to Bob Small's memory the wires on all the circuits of the Consolidated Press Association were silenced at 2 o'clock Tuesday, the hour of the funeral service.

This message was flashed over them:

"To Editors and Operators: In memory of Bob Small, a great newspaper man and a great comrade, we pause now in reverent silence as the funeral service is being held.

"(Signed) The Consolidated Press Association

"David Lawrence, President."

A. E. WOOD, N. Y. WORLD VETERAN, DIES

Succumbs to Accident Injuries at 70, After Serving Paper 32 Years—Was News Editor During World War

Albert E. Wood of 490 Fifth Street, Brooklyn, who had been with the New York World for the last 32 years as reporter, day city editor, night city editor, for 11 years as news editor, and recently as analyst, died late Monday evening in the Methodist Episcopal Hospital, Brooklyn, in his 71st year. He leaves his wife, formerly Mary G. L. Howard, a niece of the late Bronson Howard, dramatist, a son and two daughters.

A native of Portsmouth, N. H., Mr. Wood did his first work for a newspaper as delivery boy for the Portsmouth Morning Chronicle, later setting type and reporting local news items. He came to New York and spent two years on the news staff of the Morning Journal, then went to Minneapolis to establish the Sunday Mercury.

After a period as city editor of the Detroit Tribune, Mr. Wood returned to New York and reported news for the Journal, Star and Herald before joining the World in 1895. He handled many important articles for the World and was highly regarded by the late Joseph Pulitzer. His long service in the post of news editor included the World War.

LINDBERGH HOPS TO PARIS!

THE GREATEST TEST SINCE THE ARMISTICE!

Again, as usual, International News Service was first—and,
Again, as usual, International News Service was RIGHT!

When Captain Charles Lindbergh took off on May 21st on his lone hop across the Atlantic, the International News Service and every news service in the world was subjected to the greatest Speed, Accuracy and Reliability test since the Armistice.

The whole world was at tension. Rumor and false report swarmed on the news wires and were broadcast through the air. But International News Service stuck by its time-honored principle—"Get the news First, but First get it RIGHT!"

At the beginning of the day, after verifying its doubt by communicating directly with the Commander of the Ship, it rightly branded as false the report that Captain Lindbergh's plane had been sighted by the S. S. Empress of Scotland!

At 10:30 in the morning, after communicating directly with the Cable station there, it rightly branded as false, the report that Captain Lindbergh had passed over Valentia, on the coast of Ireland. He was then a full 200 miles from land!

When, two hours later, he actually did appear over Smerwick Harbor, a short distance from Valentia, International News Service received the news instantly—from its own correspondent, and sent it out as FACT!

At 12:30 it was again able to brand as false the report that a Squadron of British Planes was escorting Captain Lindbergh over the English Channel BECAUSE ITS OWN CORRESPONDENT HAD JUST REPORTED CAPTAIN LINDBERGH OVER SMERWICK HARBOR!

Finally, when Lindbergh landed, our clients knew it first!

By relying on its OWN ORGANIZATION—and its OWN MEN, International News Service supplied its clients with unimpeachable facts—The News fast—and Right!

From the moment when Captain Lindbergh took off at Mineola, until the moment when his plane taxied to glory on the flying field at Le Bourget—only that which was established fact was supplied as NEWS, in the authentic dispatches released to clients of the

WRITER'S EXTRADITION UP TO GOVERNOR

Fuller of Massachusetts Considering Case of F. H. Thompson, Wanted in New Hampshire in Atlantic Monthly Case

Fred H. Thompson, Boston Post reporter, charged with being a fugitive from justice in connection with the alleged theft of advance sheets of the Atlantic Monthly containing Governor Alfred Smith's article on Catholicism and the presidency from the plant of the Rumford Press, Concord, N. H., was held by Associate Justice Lloyd Allen in Newton, Mass., court Tuesday in $1,000 bond for hearing June 7, pending Governor Fuller's response to a request made by Governor Spaulding of New Hampshire for Thompson's extradition to that state.

Thompson is charged with having procured the theft of the magazine article in question. Attorney Edmund Whitman, counsel for Thompson, attempted to show that no crime was committed, that the magazine pages containing Smith's letter was "refuse copy," hence of no value. The judge contended, however, that the only issue before him was whether Thompson was the man who committed the alleged crime and not whether the crime was committed. The prosecuting attorney, Herbert W. Rainie, of Merrimac County, N. H., produced as a witness William E. Callahan, former employe of the Rumford Press, whom Rainie declared would show that Thompson was the same man who was charged with the commission of the crime.

Questioned by Rainie, Callahan declared he was a watchman in the Rumford Press, was in Concord on the night of April 15, when the alleged theft is said to have occurred. He admitted that he obtained pages of the magazine and that Thompson was with him at the time. He pointed out Thompson in the courtroom when asked by Rainie, "Is he in this room?"

Judge Allen ruled that cross-examination of Callahan should be limited to the field covered by Rainie. Attorney Whitman vigorously protested the court's ruling, saying, "I want to show that there was no crime committed, I want to show that on cross-examination. I want to show by this witness that Thompson went to see this man Callahan who he learned had a copy of Smith's letter. When he went to this man. this man said he had had a copy, but had loaned it to a friend. When they went to the friend's house in Thompson's machine, the friend was out plowing. Callahan then suggested that they go to the Rumford Press and Thompson stayed in machine while Callahan went in to a watchman and procured a refuse copy of Governor Smith's article."

Governor Fuller Monday received from Governor Spaulding a request that Thompson be returned to New Hampshire for trial. The Governor also has received from Attorney Whitman a request for a hearing, although no date has been set for one. It is intimated that it will be soon.

"This paper doesn't say a thing about it—must have been scooped"

OFTEN times it's "association" stuff. Both papers start from "scratch' —yet one has it on the street first. What is it that enables one paper to "beat" the other?

The news-gathering staffs, the composing rooms, the press rooms may all be the same from the standpoint of efficiency. Yet the one paper gets the news on the street first.

The difference lies in the time gained between the presses and the delivery tables. The paper that gets the news on the street while it is still "news" is pretty apt to have installed Cutler-Hammer Newspaper Conveyors. Right off the presses they come in a steady stream. Up—overhead, around corners, through a ceiling or wall—as fast as the presses turn them out the C-H Conveyor puts them on the delivery or mailing tables.

C-H Conveyors push the deadline back —enable you to get later news in every edition—enable you to beat competition. It means reputation—more public confidence—greater circulation—more advertising. Considering how vital it is, can you afford not to investigate?

There is a C-H Press Control for every type of press in your plant. Tell us the equipment you have and our engineers will make recommendations that will enable your paper to utilize the full value of news.

My dear Joe:

I want to congratulate you, as well as the community, upon your assumption of the management and direction of the Standard Union. Your association with the enterprise is, I think, a sufficient guarantee of its success. I look back with pleasant memories to the days when we were in Albany together—you as a newspaper correspondent and I as a legislator.

A warm friendship was formed then which I am sure will last as long as we are both here. It is this friendship which prompts my short note to you. While you and I differed frequently on political policies, and our points of view were in conflict on important public questions, you were always a fair critic and a square shooter.

Your exceptional capacity for newspaper management, your unquestioned integrity, and your experience compells the prediction that the Standard Union will in the future be a paper of increased interest and influence.

I wish you as a friend the best of luck and success.

Dear Mr. Jonas:

I learn with a great deal of satisfaction that you are giving financial support to Mr. Joe Early and his associates of the Brooklyn Standard Union. I have watched Mr. Early's rise over a long course of years with interest.

Your community service to Brooklyn is an assurance that you and your associates realize the opportunities that are presented to your great community in a new period of broader service.

I discovered in Washington that the recent visit of members of the Brooklyn Chamber of Commerce to that city under your leadership as President of that organization directed attention to the fact that Brooklyn is now the largest Borough, and of the fact that you are accomplishing a splendid community work.

With very best wishes, believe me,

Sincerely yours,

also disposed of thousands of copies more than usual.

Heavy street sales last Saturday and a demand for Sunday papers that could not be met were the direct results of Captain Lindbergh's flight on circulation of the Kansas City Star and the Kansas City Journal-Post. The flash on Lindbergh's arrival hit Kansas City in time for considerable chaser circulation on home editions and the story was in good shape for street sales.

The Journal-Post's afternoon street sales advanced about 8,000.

Carefully planned was this excellent news tie-up handled by Blackman Company.

The Star's increased sale of individual copies especially was noticeable in surrounding towns. "We could not meet the demand for Sunday papers," Frank Seested, circulation manager of the Star, said, "because the Star Monday morning printed Lindbergh's own story. Sales of that edition also were greatly increased, and we have reason to believe the extra circulation on this occasion will result in many new regular subscribers.

"On account of insufficient supply of gravure sections the Journal-Post did not attempt to meet the increased demand for Sunday papers, F. A. Braun, assistant circulation manager, said.

The St. Louis Post Dispatch broke all its press production records for a week day with 40,000 street sales above normal Saturday.

At Louisville K,y., the Courier-Journal reported its plant "cleaned out. Couldn't print enough." The average excess of 2,000 copies, the publishers said, went early.

Seattle newspapers reported their sales had been doubled. In San Diego, where Lindbergh began his record-breaking cross continent flight, newspapers reported their sales tripled. Los Angeles and San Francisco papers said their sales had been doubled.

The Chicago Tribune and Herald-Examiner reported enormous street sales, of which no count was available.

In Minneapolis, all three dailies reported big advances. The Tribune's Saturday extra announcing Lindbergh's landing was still selling on the street at 8:30 in the evening. The Sunday issue was completely sold out. Ten thousand extra copies were sold Monday morning, carrying Lindbergh's own story in conjunction with the New York Times.

Franklin Rook, circulation manager of the Journal, reported 3,000 extra Sunday papers sold. The Saturday P. M. sales were increased more than 60 per cent. Rook said that the glamour around the flyer, alone, young and beating everyone to it, aided sales, and not so much the fact that he lived at Little Falls, Minn., and is claimed as a former Minnesotan.

The Star, publishing no Sunday issue but a five cent feature section Saturday P. M., reported sales of 5,000 extra copies at 5 cents each.

The Lindbergh flight was characterized by San Francisco circulation managers one of the greatest news stories ever handled from the standpoint of public interest and sustained suspense. They reported heavy sales for each edition of the afternoon papers.

The Call doubled street sales. The Bulletin considered it the greatest story ever handled, practically doubling sales. The News used all boys available and increased sales heavily. Sunday morning papers pronounced it a sell-out for the entire edition.

The Examiner and Chronicle were handicapped by inability to print more Sunday editions than color sections already ordered. The Chronicle said the story increased circulation by 20,000 for Monday morning editions.

An average increase of perhaps 50 per cent in street sales was reported by Portland, Ore., newspapers. In one instance, the Evening Telegram reported a gain of 132 per cent in its street sales. The Journal and News also had heavy sales and the continued demand was indicated by the Oregonian's report the following day.

There were at least three outstanding instances of advertisers cashing in on the Lindbergh exploit. The enterprising advertisers included the Vacuum Oil Company, with Gargoyle Mobiloil; the B. F. Goodrich Rubber Company, with Silvertown cord tires; and the Franklin Motor Company, advertising its air-cooled engine.

The William H. Rankin Company, handling the Goodrich account, was able to get a full page advertisement in the New York Sun on Friday afternoon, the day the daring aviator hopped off from Roosevelt Field for Le Bourget. This advertisement was headed "Lindbergh Hops Off on Goodrich Silvertowns."

Then on Monday copy was placed in a large list of newspapers with the triumphant headline: "Lindbergh Lands in Paris on Goodrich Silvertowns."

Cities in which this advertising appeared included Kansas City, St. Paul, Minneapolis, Chicago, St. Louis, Pittsburgh, Cleveland, Akron, Detroit, Boston, Hartford, New York, Philadelphia, Washington and Baltimore.

L. A. McQueen, assistant general sales manager of the B. F. Goodrich Rubber Company, gave orders at 11 o'clock on Friday morning to the agency that it should have copy in that afternoon's New York Sun.

In company with Mr. Rankin and V. Galbo, of the agency, Mr. McQueen w down to the Sun. They were at the Su plant from 12:30 to 3:30. The copy l been approved by noon, and at 3:25 th obtained the first copy containing advertisement. Three o'clock is the de line for the night edition and the adv tisment was ready with only one min to spare.

The agency on Monday received telegram from James O'Shaughnes secretary of the American Association Advertising Agencies, reading:

"Silvertown Page is an historic t umph in advertising."

SHOP TALK AT THIRTY

By MARLEN PEW

NEWSPAPER folk of this generation never saw a peace-time story which so fascinated the public mind as has the New York-Paris hop of Charlie Lindbergh. It is the incomparably "good story" of the age, possessed all of the qualities that students of journalistic values consider necessary to the perfect news situation, plus several glittering novelties.

PRIMARILY, of course, the appeal was to the primitive human emotion which exults at the spectacle of man risking life to gain mastery over the elements or some seemingly invincible antagonist. In this case the conflict was new and startling, a feat dramatic beyond the imagination of even imaginative people and overwhelmingly sensational to persons of routine habits of thought. Add to the dramatic features of the exploit the fact that the adventure was undertaken for a high and sensible purpose, involving deep-rooted patriotic impulses, and you have a protagonism calculated to make the public heart thump like a kettle-drum expressing the wildest, Wagnerian motif. Capping all this was the combination of magnificent youth, lean and wiry strength, death-defying courage, supreme confidence, no brag or ostentation but even genuine blushing modesty, quiet and effective action, a bewitching smile and naive boyishness, making Lindbergh an incomparable hero in the role.

THE sympathetic factor in this story would be difficult to exaggerate. The clean, young aviator appealed to every normal mind. To the average man he stood out as a model son, a stout piece of human hickory upon whom a father or employer could lean with absolute confidence in business or in home life. He satisfied the brightest dreams of average motherhood, not alone by reason of his gallant battle, crowned by victory and its golden spoils, but for his kid-like attitudes, promise of glorious and fruitful manhood, softness of facial expression and shy tenderness toward his own mother and the mother of a fallen French colleague of the skies. Young manhood instinctively claimed him as a brother in every sense. And unmarried or dissatisfied womanhood, wherever the printed word has carried the news of his adventure, has been suddenly plunged into mad, ecstatic love of him. In our own little circle we saw a hard-boiled newspaper man, who usually rests late on Sunday mornings, up and walking a mile and a quarter last Sunday morning to meet the paper train; a mother was so worried during Saturday night that she sat most of the time at a window and when news was flashed that Lindy was safe, this woman buried her head in her apron and sobbed; a tiny little school girl, in our sight, went through the thrilling emotions of first love, sitting practically all day looking at Lindy's pictures; two young boys fairly went into a trance when the aviator's story was read aloud in the family circle and all day they kept repeating the facts, asking questions and paying little tributes to the new-found knight. Ambassador Herrick says Lindbergh's stunt has done more to cement Franco-American relations than all diplomacy. We believe, also, that his example of decent, purposeful, dignified young manhood contributed to the rank and file of society a moral lesson that will endure when all of last Sunday's pulpit preachments have been forgotten. If we were asked who has contributed the finest, most ennobling thoughts to the whole people in the current year we should unhesitatingly answer "Lindbergh." We can well believe that millions passed a sleepless night when Lindbergh's plane was in perilous flight and hugged close to every known means of comunication to catch the joyous word that he had safely landed at the scheduled point of destination. Never in peace times, the record shows, have newspapers been in such lively demand as during the period of suspense of this trans-Atlantic flight. The circulation jump is comparable only to the excited hours that followed the signing of the armistice that brought world peace.

SO in this classic adventure we have in bold relief the irresistible factors of conflict, suspense, heroism in grand mold, patriotism, epic love, compensation in terms both practical and ideal and numerous other story values such as charming masculine modesty and decent character easily defeating unwholesome temptations; sudden success rewarding persistent, faithful, thoughtful, honest plugging effort; and the spectacular rise to the pinnacle of fame and fortune of an obscure lad known to his schoolmates as "Cheese" and to his aviator friends as "Lucky" and the "Flying Fool"—the latter, we take it, being in the sense of the unreasoning zealot. We have the notion that it was Lindbergh's sudden and almost unheralded dash to first-page popularity that gave his story its marvelous aromatic flavor. It was absolutely unspoiled by press agents, fakers, climbers or any of the familiar gentry that almost invariably are to be detected in some manner clinging to shooting stars in the news firmament. It was Lindbergh, the good boy unadulterated, that we saw and his motive expressed the grand theme of pioneering under the Stars and Stripes.

FOR days we have been ransacking memory for a modern peace-time story that might be compared with the Lindbergh adventure for newspaper values. It does not exist. Admiral Peary's discovery of the North Pole probably measures the nearest to it, although it was clouded, at the time, by Dr. Cook's fraudulent "horn-in," and the Admiral was no such captivating hero as is this youthful birdman from the western plains. Most of the story elements involved in the North Pole adventure were intrinsically better than the unassisted trans-Atlantic flight. There was much more to write about. The conflict seemed, at the time, more fierce. But we do not remember that vast numbers of the people actually lost their sleep in suspense over Peary's fate or that they ran wildly about cheering news of his triumphant return. News of Peary's discovery sold papers, but with no such spontaniety as was experienced from the moment Lindbergh hopped into space until the last vital word concerning his safe arrival was reeled from the presses. Capt. Roald Amundsen's South Pole enterprise was relatively tame, although essentially a great story. Comparable American heroic figures, in war-time, were Dewey and Hobson. America never witnessed wilder hero-worship than that which flung itself at the Admiral conqueror of the Spanish fleet at Manila Bay when he came sailing home. The story of Hobson's magnificent daring in sinking the Merrimac in Santiago harbor furnished the best hero story of the Spanish-American war and, I think is a close counterpart to Lindbergh's exploit, from the viewpoint of popularity. One thinks, of course, of the scores and hundreds of heroes of the World War and the stories concerning them that electrified newspaper readers in the 1914-1918 period, but somehow these figures seemed swallowed up by the dumbfounding immensity of the war operations of those days. No individual could stand out against that bewildering background of action to be accepted by all the people. Of all the stories of individual heroism in the World War, we believe the martyrdom of Edith Cavell at Brussels was unapproached for elements that penetrate the hearts and thrill the minds of newspaper readers. Proof is that everyone remembers her name.

TRUTH is not only stranger than fiction, it is ten thousand times more interesting. All that happened to Lindbergh, written by the best fiction author of the day, would constitute a short-story of only ordinary interest. But when the news flashed, "Lindbergh DOES it!" (which, by the way, was the New York Times' admirable Sunday headline) the challenge was supreme. The story needed no writing flourish. It told itself. The simple fact became literature of the best kind. Indeed, Lindbergh's own narrative might have been dashed off by any schoolboy, so far as its literary merit went. It was not remarkable even for incident, yet the eye of the average citizen a it up and begged for more. The fa is the big thing in the newspaper and much better raw than dressed.

THANKS for the plane ride, Mr. Lin bergh! It was the real thing and grand refreshment. Don't let any sma Alec press agent tell you how! Don't any reporter tease you into talking abo girls! Don't kiss or be kissed, in publi if you can avoid it! Don't appear on t stage or in the movies! Heroism Mr. Lindbergh, is a dangerous role t play, by far more flickle than the ic winds off Cape Race. If you succeed i gliding through the storms that are sur to beset your path in the streets of Amer ican cities, you will deserve a monumen that will make Miss Liberty's statue loo like a waterplug.

Comparative New England as Your Market...

Wage Earners and Wages Paid...

NEW ENGLAND	1,258,000	$1,475,000,000
6 Western States	720,000	111,700,000

A Billion and a half payroll a year is a good healthy income for a group of wage earners. Most of it is spent with the grocer, druggist, dry goods and clothing store—furniture store, movie theatre and a little is salted away with the Bank for the rainy day.

The National Advertiser studying the comparative markets has no problem to determine which will give him greater returns for money spent in a newspaper campaign. The New England figures speak eloquently in behalf of unlimited Buying Power. They conclusively prove that New England should be on the list of every advertiser—large or small.

John Irvin Becomes Classified Manager of N. Y. Telegram—C. W. Horn to Represent Association at Portland Meet—Big Business Built by Little Want Ad

JOHN IRVIN has resigned as assistant classified advertising manager of the New York American to become classified advertising manager of the New York Telegram, succeeding T. F. Mulhern, made display manager. No successor on the American will be named, C. W. Horn, classified manager, informed EDITOR & PUBLISHER.

Mr. Irvin became associated with the New York American the first of this year, after having spent a year as classified manager of the New Orleans Item and Tribune. During the first few months of 1927 Mr. Irvin worked under R. E. Seiler, general manager of classified of the Hearst newspapers. Then he was appointed assistant to Mr. Horn.

Previously Mr. Irvin had been for many years classified advertising manager of the Des Moines (Ia.) Register and Tribune.

C. W. Horn, classified manager of the New York American, will represent the National Association of Classified Advertising Managers at the Pacific Advertising Clubs Association's convention in Portland, Ore., June 22. Then he is planning to go to Denver when he will speak before the Association of Newspaper Advertising Executives.

Frank McCabe, for many years classified manager of the New York World, has joined the Brown Advertising Agency, Inc., in the Times Building, New York.

Little want-ads can build big business. The truth of this saying may be seen in the case of Foster & Waldo, a Minneapolis piano store, which has advertised in the Minneapolis Tribune every day for 44 years.

In a letter to P. M. Hughes of the Tribune, C. W. Ream, advertising manager of the piano store, wrote:

"Our belief in the tremendous power of the little classified advertisement is best exemplified by stating that for 44 years the Tribune has never gone to press without a Foster & Waldo classified advertisement for trade-in pianos.

"In other words, this means that Foster & Waldo have had a classified ad in the Tribune for 16,060 consecutive days."

Mr. Hughes is inclined to consider this as a long distance record.

vertising trade publications, thereby getting double value from such advertising.

The Milwaukee Journal sent out a large piece made up of full pages about its market. Apparently this originally was a series, "Make Milwaukee Mightier", co-operatively run by local firms.

Color was used well by the Oklahoma City Oklahoman and Times in a book about its trading area. In surprisingly few cases was color used to advantage i other publishers.

The St. Louis Globe-Democrat miniature house organ, chock full of facts in very small compass, stood out in contrast with the two large pieces. It was easy to read.

The influence of the book published by the 100,000 group of American cities, which appeals to all thinking advertising executives, was reflected in a reprint o material by the Brooklyn Ea

A clear and comprehensive letter from the John Budd Company described the Galveston market.

"Keeping Tabs On Schenectady" a monthly sheet of "dope", is issued by the Union-Star of that city. "Texas Business", a monthly paper of facts, arrives from the Dallas Morning News and Journal. The Chicago American announced a new 4-color process by sending a sample of the section.

A grist of letters announcing new rates, mergers, special local events, etc., occupied a large part of the mail, in addition to perhaps a foot-high stack of plain ordinary "ballyhoo", mostly blo ing about linage. It was evident t in too many cases, some figures had b hurriedly thrown together to please publisher, inserted in a full page in newspaper, and then rushed out "as to inform an eager (?) waiting wor Very little originality in form on general run of newspaper promotion apparent.

Every mail brings the executive w controls advertising budgets a tidal wa of promotion literature, perhaps one-th from newspapers. The competition attention and interest is keen. The ne paper publisher in self-protection sho try to improve the value and quality what he sends out and build it from prospect's point of view.

Our Own World of Letters

By JAMES MELVIN LEE

IN the books relating to journalism that are listed in the International Year Book of EDITOR & PUBLISHER there is one omission. Under the head of histories of individual newspapers "The New York Tribune—Incidents and Personalities in its History" by Royal Cortissoz should be included. Privately printed by the New York Tribune, it was not openly marketed to the reading public. Indeed, it was only recently brought to my attention by Arthur S. Draper, assistant editor of the New York Herald Tribune.

Of all the histories of New York newspapers this volume is the smallest in number of pages. But it does present in an admirable way the historical narrative of the New York Tribune and indicates the significant dates of those notable achievements which have contributed to the growth of the Tribune.

Small as the volume is, it sheds new light on the life of Horace Greeley, the founder of the Tribune. It brings out with added emphasis the long list of brilliant newspaper men who were trained under Greeley in the office of the Tribune. E. L. Godkin was speaking of these Greeley days when he said:

> During the three or four years before the war, to get admission to the columns of the Tribune almost gave the young writer a patent of literary nobility, and Greeley in those years welcomed talent, male and female, from any quarter and in any field.

The Tribune under the editorship of Whitelaw Reid is then taken up. Here, as elsewhere, the fairness of the volume impresses itself upon the reader. Justice is done to all the newspaper men who worked with Reid. The concluding ten pages (67-77) traces the history of the Tribune since Ogden Reid joined the staff in 1908.

DRAMATIC critics who want an excellent volume about the modern stage should get a copy of "Modern English Playwrights" (Harper & Brothers) by John W. Cunliffe, Director of the Pulitzer School of Journalism. The volume deserves a place on the shelves of the newspaper library because of the frequency with which dramatic criticism printed in British and American newspapers is quoted.

Director Cunliffe in this short history of the English drama opens his volume with an introductory chapter on the stage of the early years of the century. He then takes up the Victorian transition. Other chapters consider each of the important playwrights from that time down to today.

In addition to "Modern English Playwrights" Director Cunliffe has in preparation a companion volume, "Modern English Plays."

THE sons of Methodists ministers in and around New York have organized themselves into a society. Their official club organ is The Methodist Manse. The current issue is a journalism number which features Methodist ministers' sons who are actualy engaged in newspaper work. Two sketches in this number deserve passing mention—those of Melville E. Stone and E. W. Howe.

CERTAIN chapters in "An Outline of Careers" (George H. Doran Company) edited by Edward L. Bernays deserve special mention in "Our Own World of Letters."

The chapter that sets forth the opportunities of advertising is contributed by Stanley Resor, president of the J. Walter Thompson Company. Mr. Resor answers such practical questions as, "What then is advertising at its best?" next, "What knowledge does this work require?" "How is this work of advertising done?" He concludes his chapter with a discussion of the qualities essential to success in advertising.

The chapter of special interest to the readers of EDITOR & PUBLISHER is the one on journalism contributed by Roy W. Howard. On the swing of the pendulum in journalism he comments as follows:

> Centainly business office methods on American newspapers—production, circulation and advertising—have become much more highly organized and much more thoroughly systematized than has the editorial. Editorial ingenuity has been at relatively low ebb and has recently evidenced neither the enterprise nor the originality that has characterized the commercial side of the business.
> An editorial renaissance is overdue. Newspapers have not been improving their standing in the public esteem as they should and as they must. The demands of the times and the needs of the situation are certain to produce the men who will raise American journalism, already the most efficient in the world (excepting possibly a certain small element in the British press) to the high level of efficiency and service which is possible of attainment.

Later Mr. Howard outlines the opportunities as follows:

> To the man for whom journalism spells something far removed from the counting room; to one for whom the term suggests action, romance, adventure, contact with the most interesting people in the community, the state or the world; to one with imagination straining at the leash; to one with an ability to extract a thrill of satisfaction from service to others; to one blest with an observing eye, a logical mind and the power of transcribing thoughts and impressions into simple, direct English—for such the first port of call on life's vocational voyage is certainly that noisy, cluttered scene of organized confusion, the city room.

On the subject of technical instruction in journalism Mr. Howard writes:

> A question frequently asked these days has to do with the value of schools of journalism. No general answer can be made. Some of these courses are probably worse than useless. This is certainly true of those schools where the teaching is in the hands of men who have been failures themselves as newspapermen, and who are without vision as to the needs of either their pupils or the press.
> On the other hand, it cannot be denied that splendid work has been done by some of these schools, and in the case of one in particular, under the direction of a man of high character and splendid ideals, an exceptional group of students has been turned out, with an equipment that has undoubtedly contributed very greatly to their rapid advancement.

Those who want to break into the newspaper business will find an excellent method described somewhat in detail by Mr. Howard.

Other chapters of interest to members of the working press include "Editing" by Ray Long, editor-in-chief of the International Magazine Corporation; "Public Relations" by Edward L. Bernays, the editor of the book itself; and "Publishing" by George H. Doran, president of the company that puts out the book.

Editors of business pages will find certain other chapters of practical value. The book itself, of course, was published primarily to be of aid to the young men about to make the choice of a career.

WHAT should a store advertise? That is the question which Kenneth Collins, advertising manager of R. H. Macy & Company, Inc., answers in the current issue of the Journal of Retailing. His answer is not so specific as it might be but, in his opinion, store advertising today puts undue emphasis on "leaders"—"spotlight values," to use a phrase frequently heard in the discussions on retail advertising.

What gives a store individuality? The answer to that question Mr. Collins believes would help to determine what should be featured in advertising. Among the possible things that may give a store individuality Mr. Collins mentions "widest assortments in the city," "style prestige," "consistent price policy," "advantages in the way of credit facilities," "convenience of location," "general excellence of sales force," etc. All these are legitimate subject matter for newspaper advertising. The store that adequately exploits them in newspaper columns will build up a "store preference" on the part of possible buyers.

Another point emphasized by Mr. Collins is the need for a regular clientele. In days gone by people were in the habit of trading at such-and-such a store because it had been a family custom to patronize that establishment. But American people today are living in a restless age and move about frequently. There is no "old established" store to the newcomer unless he has seen the name in t newspaper.

This article by Mr. Collins gives number of tips to solicitors who want put suggestions before advertising ma agers of local stores.

A PERMANENT assignment to cri cize American newspapers seems have been given by the American Me cury to Dewey M. Owens, city editor the Knoxville Journal. The specific a signment covered in the Mercury i June is "Syndicate Stuff."

After mentioning the origin of sy dicate material, Mr. Owens passes on say that with the advent of monstro Sunday papers the syndicates grew li mushrooms. In his opinion 90 per ce of the syndicate material is the verie dribble and that comic strips, "with ve few exceptions," are all idiotic and a addressed to children under eight.

W. C. Freeman, Writing Copy for Bronx Funeral Director, Sees Need for Closer Relations with Public

William C. Freeman, veteran newspaper advertising man, is back in New York after an absence of five years in Florida. He has resumed his special work in the metropolis which he characterizes as "Personality with the Pen."

"Pop" Freeman, as he is known in newspaper circles, believes newspaper advertising today has proved that it is the most economical and most effective form of advertising employed.

He is doing a piece of work today which he believes will result eventually in securing advertising for newspapers in every community in the United States from an industry that is one of the most important of any in the country—an industry that is not affected in any way by general business conditions, good or bad.

Nearly eighteen years ago Mr. Freeman says he became impressed with the necessity of people knowing reliable undertakers on whom to call in the certainty that these men will show the same tenderness in caring for their dead that they received during life.

After nursing this idea for nearly eighteen years, Mr. Freeman says, he has found an undertaker who is willing to go to the public with practical messages about his profession. The name of this undertaker is Fred H. Blood, of the Bronx, who uses one column once a week in the Home News. Mr. Freeman is writing the copy which carries Mr. Blood's signature. It is said of this copy that it meets the approval of the Bronx County Undertakers Association, which has invited Mr. Freeman to talk on advertising at a meeting June 6.

It has been suggested that Mr. Freeman syndicate the copy he is using for Mr. Blood which can be used by any reliable undertaker in any community in the United States. A plan is being developed to do this.

"Very few people realize that the undertaking business represents an investment of more than $1,250,000,000 of capital," Mr. Freeman said. "Very few people realize that the number of deaths in the United States averages 1,300,000 yearly. On the basis of an average of $500 for every funeral the business totals approximately $650,000,000 a year. On the most conservative basis the undertakers of the country can well afford to invest in newspaper advertising at least ten per cent of the volume of business they do yearly, or $65,000,000. Mr. Blood spends $4,680 annually in the Home News and he pays me for my service as much as he pays for the space."

Former Football Coach Suing Asheville Daily for Libel

The suit of H. P. Sanborn, former athletic coach at the University of North Carolina, against the Asheville Times, was recently continued until the August term of court. Wednesday of the second week of August has been set for the hearing.

Sanborn, now a resident of Washington, D. C., is suing the Asheville paper for $100,000, one-half of the amount being for damages he alleges was done to his character through the appearance of his picture in the paper, under which it was explained that he was an escaped convict, and for the loss of his job as a coach with the University. The other $50,000 is asked in punitive damages.

70,178 More families in Indiana in 1927

In the last six years over 70,000 families or nearly 300,000 people have been added to Indiana's population in towns of 1,000 population and over. All the important cities show substantial gains, which means that each city is constantly increasing in buying power.

Most of Indiana's cities house large and well diversified industries that furnish steady employment to its citizens all the year 'round.

These people represent the intelligent American family. Illiteracy is almost negligible—and at least one newspaper enters the home daily.

A well planned campaign in the newspapers listed below reaches this constantly increasing buying force. Why not place Indiana on your list.

ALABAMA PRESS HOLDS CONVENTION AT SEA

R. B. Vail of Baldwin Times Elected President on Board Ship Returning from New York—Richardson Vice-president

The Alabama Press Association held its 1927 convention in Savannah, Georgia, New York City, and on the Atlantic Ocean between these two cities from May 7 to 15. It was attended by 80 editors, members of their families, and friends who enjoyed the novel tour, which was made possible by the co-operation of the Central of Georgia Railway Company and the Ocean Steamship Company. Plans for it were worked out by F. W. Stanley of the Greenville Advocate and Horace Hall of the Dothan Eagle, president and secretary, as representatives of the Alabama Press Association, and J. D. McCartney, assistant to President J. J. Pelley of the Central of Georgia Railway and the Ocean Steamship Company.

The party arrived in New York the morning of May 10 on the "City of Birmingham" and left May 12 for the return trip. They were guests of the American Type Founders Company, at Jersey City, N. J., at a luncheon and inspection of the plant. They were entertained at a banquet by the American Press Association. They were given a sightseeing tour of the city by the Mergenthaler Linotype Company. This company entertained at luncheon also. The New York Times entertained at a buffet luncheon, including music by the chorus club and band of the Times, after which a trip through the plant was made.

The Metropolitan Life Insurance Company entertained at luncheon. The Waldorf-Astoria Hotel was headquarters while in New York. Special rates were granted.

On the night of the 13th, while at sea, the party met in business session in the music room of the City of Birmingham where committee reports were heard and approved, and officers for the ensuing year were elected. R. B. Vail, editor, Baldwin Times, Bay Minette, was elected president succeeding F. W. Stanley, of the Greenville Advocate. Lawrence S. Richardson, of the Jasper Mountain Eagle, was named vice-president.

Jack M. Pratt, editor of the Carrollton Pickens County Herald, succeeded Horace Hall, of Dothan, as secretary-treasurer. Mr. Pratt was also made editor of Alapressa, official organ of the association. P. O. Davis, editor, Extension Service, Alabama Polytechnic Institute, Auburn, was re-elected official reporter. N. C. Cady, of the Western Newspaper Union, Birmingham, was re-elected business manager of Alapressa. Gen. John B. Stanley, of the Greenville Advocate, was elected historian, and Mrs. W. C. Thomas, of the Citronelle Call, was elected poetess.

FINED FOR FRAUD AD

"Sale" Prices Cause Arrest of Winston-Salem Jewelry Man

Charged with fraudulent advertising, J. L. Young, operator of the J. L. Young Jewelry Company, has been fined $25 and costs in municipal court, Winston-Salem, N. C. Young, through his attorney, appealed, and bond was fixed at $200.

The case centered around a jewelry sale, now in progress at the store. Young sent out circulars advising that his wares were being offered at greatly reduced prices. The Winston-Salem Advertising club investigated the circulars and sale. Different people were sent to the store to purchase articles, which were later checked with the advertisements sent out by Young through the mails, and then taken to jewelers who appraised the value of the articles.

A warrant was then issued for Young's arrest.

The Tribune's comic strip family builds circulation!

SEVEN great comic strips—each totally different from the other—each appealing! Besides excellent drawing and consistently humorous situations, each of these comics tells a story—each day's playlet depicts developments in the lives of its main characters!

The following comic strips have developed millions of readers for the Chicago Tribune and the New York News—the two newspapers ranking at the top of the heap in daily morning circulation in America!

GASOLINE ALLEY, by Frank King—Fat, amiable Walt, and his charming wife and southern Rachel bring up Skeezix, the beloved comic strip child. The well developed plot of "Gasoline Alley" grows daily more interesting!

LITTLE ORPHAN ANNIE, by Harold Gray—Orphan asylum, mansion, boarding school, farm—Annie's topsy-turvy life never lacks variety! A lovable child who philosophizes amusingly about her experiences.

SMITTY, by Walter Berndt—a bright, normal American boy, ambitious to add to the family income and to have as good a time as possible while doing so.

HAROLD TEEN, by Carl Ed—Humor and pathos of adolescence—Harold, the 17-year-old dandy, attempts to be whatever type of man the fair Lillums most admires at the moment. The comic strip which sets the styles for the younger set.

WINNIE WINKLE, THE BREADWINNER, by Branner—Winnie demonstrated, long before it became an axiom, that "gentlemen prefer blondes"—a comic strip depicting the vicissitudes of a pretty steno's life.

TEXAS SLIM, by Ferd Johnson—The youngest of America's successful cartoonists. A protegé of Frank Willard! Texas Slim depicts most humorously the adventures of a tenderfoot—love and fighting in the great open spaces!

The MARKET of the New York Herald Tribune

The New York Herald Tribune offers a market all its own. There is a smaller difference between the Herald Tribune's weekday and Sunday circulations than between those of any other New York newspaper, proving a definite Herald Tribune field. This is further demonstrated by the closest analysis of its circulation. No other newspaper is in a position to duplicate this market to even appproximately 40%.

The concentration of Herald Tribune circulation parallels those parts of the New York Metropolitan Market—where most people own their own homes;

where the best class of homes is found;
where the best class of retail outlets is found;
where most automobiles per capita are found;
where the largest portion of people pay income taxes;
where most money is concentrated.

This is a Quality Market—a market defined by the taste and intelligence of Herald Tribune readers. But it is not an exclusive market, either socially or financially—it is too big.

NOTE: There are only 203,996 Personal Income Tax returns from the New York trading area (City and 50 mile zone) in 1923. The Herald Tribune's circulation weekdays is 236,312 in this area and 255,196 Sundays.

The New York Herald Tribune offers:

A market defined geographically and intellectually
A market unduplicated by any other single newspaper
A market of greatest buying power
A market that can be merchandised.

The Philadelphia Bulletin again stands "four square" with the policies of the Association of National Advertisers

At the 17th Anniversary Convention of the A. N. A. at Detroit on May 11th, 1927, O. C. Harn, one of the founders and past president of the A. N. A., and now managing director of the Audit Bureau of Circulations, said: "The members of A. N. A. should call upon publishers to define the elements of their circulation, and to sell those elements, rather than mere quantity of circulation."

Elements of The Bulletin's Circulation

The Philadelphia Bulletin is a conservative family type of newspaper of the better grade, free of sensationalism of any kind.

That the people of Philadelphia and vicinity appreciate the efforts of The Bulletin to give them all the news of the day, as fairly, as exactly and impartially as it can be laid before them, is attested by the fact that not only has the name of The Bulletin become as a household word among them, but that its circulation reaches far beyond the highest point ever attained by a Philadelphia newspaper.

How The Bulletin's Circulation Was Obtained

The Philadelphia Bulletin is sold on its merits as a newspaper. No prize, premium, guessing contests, or other methods of artificially stimulating circulation have been used.

Dominate Philadelphia

Create maximum impression at one cost by concentrating in the newspaper "nearly everybody" reads—

The Evening Bulletin.

Senator Borah Heads List of I.A.A. Speakers For Denver Convention June 26-29

Contest for Presidency Looms Between Woodbridge and Lou Holland—Detroit Bidding for 1928 Meeting—Carroll Announces A. N. A. E. Program—Hume Outlines Research Bureau Plans

SENATOR WILLIAM E. BORAH of Idaho this week accepted the invitation to address the 23rd annual convention of the International Advertising Association in Denver June 26-29, leaving only one vacancy on the speakers' list. Coincident with the announcement of Senator Borah's acceptance, Earle Pearson, association manager, made public the program for the convention's general sessions and Frederic W. Hume, chairman of the New York committee on the I.A.A. program of future activities, issued a diagram which shows in graphic detail the proposed organization of the I.A.A. educational and research bureau, described first and exclusively in EDITOR & PUBLISHER of last week.

Frank E. Carroll, Indianapolis News, and president of the Association of Newspaper Advertising Executives, also submitted this week to national headquarters of the I.A.A. the program of the newspaper departmental sessions to be held in Denver. It is printed for the first time elsewhere in this story.

It became known this week that there is the likelihood of a contest for the I.A.A. presidency. C. K. Woodbridge has agreed to run for third term at the request of the Adcraft Club of Detroit, and it was also said in New York that Lou Holland, former president, has started a campaign for another term. Detroit is going to ask to be the convention city in 1928, and Dallas, Tex., is already making plans for 1929.

The vacancy to be filled among speakers at general sessions is for the evening of Monday, June 27. Mr. Hubert Work, secretary of the Interior, was to have addressed delegates at this time, but has notified the I.A.A. that unforeseen business will prevent his attendance.

General sessions will all be held in the Broadway Theatre, according to word which reached New York on Monday from Joseph Moorehead, general convention chairman. The Broadway Theatre is next door to the Cosmopolitan Hotel, convention headquarters, and has an interior entrance from the hotel lobby to the theatre foyer. The theatre holds about 2,800 people.

The opening inspirational meeting of the convention set for 3:30 in the afternoon of Sunday, June 26, will, however, be held in the Denver Civic Center. E.D. Gibbs, advertising director of the National Cash Register Company, Dayton, O., and chairman of the general program committee, will preside. In addition to the musical program and addresses of welcome being arranged by the local committee, the keynote address will be delivered by Dr. J. Whitcomb Brougher, pastor of the First Baptist Church of Oakland, Cal., and president of the Northern Baptist Convention. The subject of his address is announced as "Service and Success."

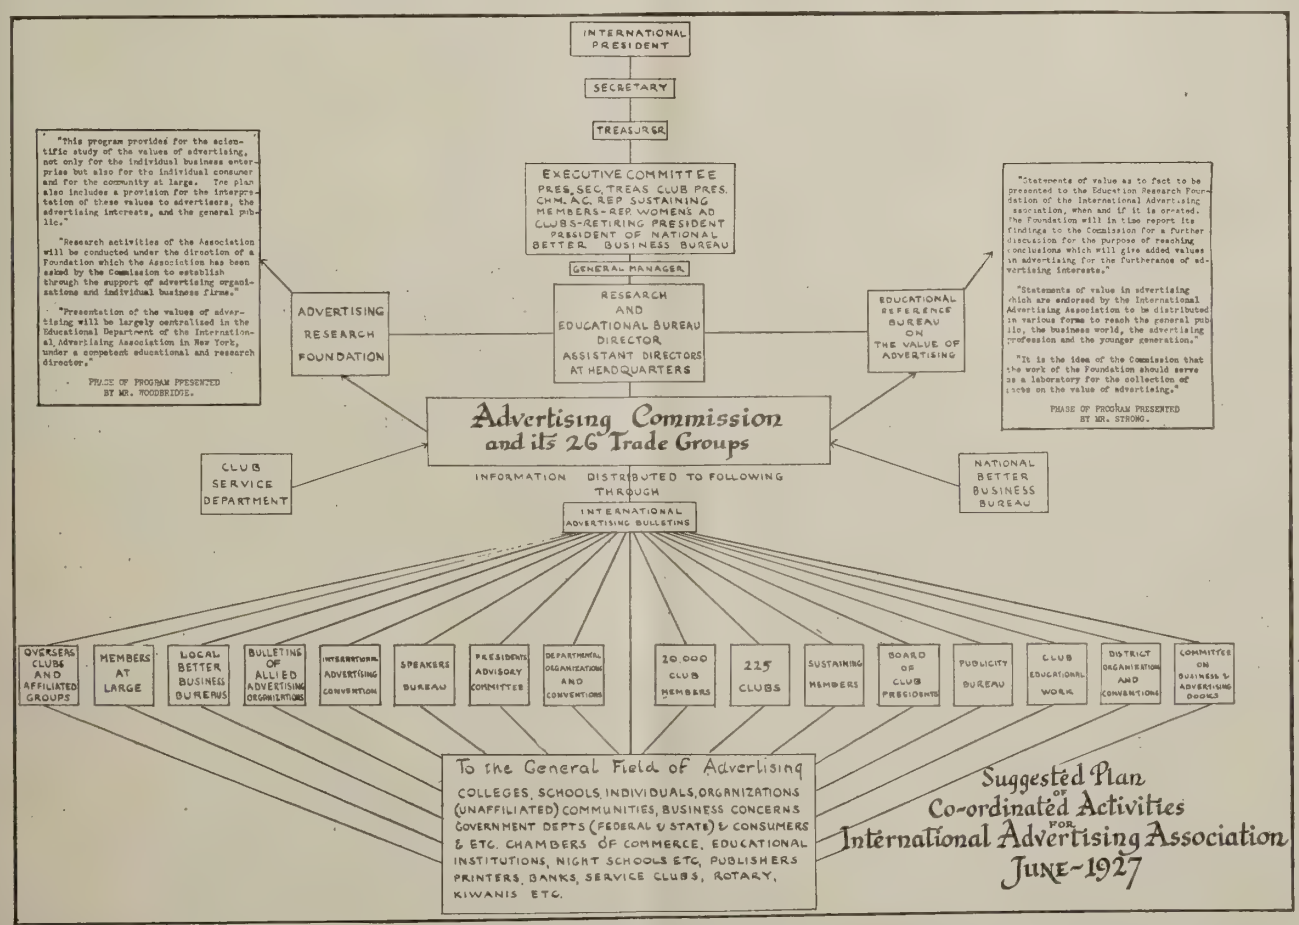
President Woodbridge, as the opening speaker on Monday morning, will explain the theme of the convention, which is "The Growth of Industry and the Part Advertising is Playing in Its Development."

Following President Woodbridge on the platform will be Joe Mitchell Chapple, of Boston, Mass., who will talk on "The New Advertising Epoch." Next will be Merlin Hall Aylesworth, president of the National Broadcasting Company of New York on "The Romance of Radio." Final speaker at the Monday morning session will be the only woman speaker at general sessions, Mrs. Emily Newell Blair of Washington, D. C., whose subject will be "The Women That Buy." S. L. Rothafel, ("Roxy") of New York, will speak Monday night.

Col. Paul Henderson, general manager of the National Air Transport Company, Chicago, will open the general sessions of Tuesday, speaking on "The Wings of Business." Other speakers of this day in order will be Francis H. Sisson, vice-president of the Guaranty Trust Company, on "Problems of Prosperity"; Hon. James Rolph Jr., Mayor of San Francisco, on "Community Advertising as San Francisco Knows It," and James F. Owens, vice-president and general manager of the Oklahoma Gas and Electric Company, Oklahoma City.

Senator Borah will be the headliner of Tuesday evening with W. E. Harkness, manager of the auxiliary service of the American Telephone and Telegraph Company of New York, on "Some Commercial Uses of Telephotographs."

The convention closes with a business meeting Wednesday. It is at this time that the proposed plan of the research bureau will be presented to I.A.A. members, and it will be explained by speakers that the association must raise an additional $50,000 a year to support the idea. A speaker at this session will be Harold Stonier, vice-president of the University of Southern California, and president of the Advertising Club of Los Angeles. Mr. Stonier is known to be an ardent advocate of club development work in the I.A.A.



The diagram showing in tentative form the structure of the I.A.A. organization with the addition of the Research Bureau, published herewith, was endorsed at a preliminary meeting of New York leaders at the Advertising Club on Tuesday, May 31. Following the meeting, Frederic W. Hume, chairman of the New York committee advocating the program, discussed the plan with a reporter of EDITOR & PUBLISHER.

"This proposed program and structural re-organization of the I.A.A. would make the association a crucible for all practices of advertising," he explained. "The I. A.A., with a research bureau headed by an outstanding economist, would become the final authority on all problems of advertising and the source of facts in the event of disputes arising between any of the various advertising interests.

"The set-up as shown in the diagram does not differ materially from the present operation of the I.A.A., aside from the addition of the research bureau, operated by a director of national repute, whose findings will be coordinated and distributed through the channels as shown.

NO CHEERS FROM WHITE HOUSE CORPS AS COOLIDGE PICKS SUMMER HOME

State Game Lodge in Black Hills Is 32 Miles from Rapid City Where Telegraph and Hotel Facilities Are Limited —Single Telephone Line to Lodge

By J. BART CAMPBELL

WASHINGTON, June 1.—Newspaper correspondents at the National Capital are not participating in any semblance of a wild scramble to follow President Coolidge into the Black Hills of South Dakota for his summer vacation.

The thought that Coolidge will make his home at the State game lodge, previously used as a hotel for tourists, which is 32 miles from Rapid City, selected for the executive offices, has been sufficient to dampen the ardor of even the more seasoned newspaper veterans of Paul Smith's and Swampscott.

The newspapermen will be forced to make their headquarters at Rapid City, which possesses extremely restricted telegraph and telephone facilities, and a single commercial hotel.

But one telephone wire now connects Rapid City with the State lodge. Two additional telephone wires are planned, but even they will hardly relieve newspaper correspondents of the necessity of motoring 64 miles at least once daily to and from the latest Summer White House.

The one newspaper published at Rapid City, the Journal, possesses an Associated Press membership. The International News Service, the United Press and other news services have not heretofore extended to Rapid City, although arrangements are now being made to have ample telegraph wires strung between Rapid City and Denver and other telegraph centers to take care of the dispatches certain to pile up before hard-worked operators.

To get the news of the President's daily movements to the outside world newspaper correspondents already are anticipating strenuous days and nights during the summer months. The President may decide to motor to the executive offices at Rapid City daily, or perhaps not more often than Tuesday and Friday, the days fixed for his bi-weekly "conferences" with newspapermen, but those whose job will be to describe Coolidge's stay at the State lodge will naturally have to journey there often to absorb proper "color" and information at close range.

Rapid City is situated upon the edge of a prairie, amid the famous Black Hills alfalfa fields. Reports reaching the White House indicate that Rapid City is entirely devoid of trees and does not suggest a vacation resort, although its altitude of 3,300 feet above the sea level provides a comfortable atmosphere despite a blazing sun.

Custer, which is only 14 miles from the State lodge, was considered for a time as a place at which to locate the executive offices and the base of supplies for the Summer White House, especially as it is on the Chicago, Burlington and Quincy Railroad, but it was decided that Rapid City possessed more adequate, if quite limited, facilities.

The State lodge itself, however attractive from a rustic viewpoint, is nothing to compare, in architectural beauty with the summer home Mr. and Mrs. Coolidge and their retinue occupied at Swampscott two summers ago. Nor does it afford the rich furnishings for which the Swampscott home was noted. It also lacks the luxuries that existed for the Coolidges at the White Pine Camp in the Adirondacks last summer. The lodge is, however, commodious, possessing 20 rooms, and is surrounded by rustic log structures which may be used by the Coolidge guests and servants. The President will be able to sit upon the front porch and enjoy the sight of deer and other game animals roaming around, for the lodge is situated in one part of an immense game preserve of 125,000 acres in which there are bear and mountain lion, several hundred buffalo and 2,000 elk, as well as a great variety of wild fowl. The immediate country may not be as wild as it sounds however, for there is a nine-hole golf course near the lodge, and trout fishing may be carried on uninterruptedly, it is reported, within a short walk of the picturesque three-story wooden structure.

A string of saddle horses overlorded by one Dakota Clyde Jones, a ranch product of the Dakotas, who has gained fame as a bronco-twister, is kept for rides over the steep mountain trails and through the valleys leading from the lodge.

Newspaper correspondents already assigned to "cover" the lodge are threatening to take lessons in Washington's riding academies, although the road between the lodge and Rapid City is reported to be admirably suited for automobiling.

Those correspondents who have already "signed up" at the White House to spend the summer between the lodge and Rapid City are: Paul R. Mallon, United Press; Francis M. Stephenson and Ray Henley, Associated Press; John T. Lambert, Universal Service; George E. Durno, International News; Edgar Markham, St. Paul Dispatch and Pioneer Press; Harry C. Stevens, Minneapolis Journal; Charles R. Michael, New York Times; Theodore E. Wallen, New York Herald Tribune; J. Russell Young, Washington Star; Norman W. Baxter, Washington Post; Robert L. Norton, Boston Post; Charles S. Groves, Boston Globe; Raymond G. Carroll, Philadelphia Public Ledger and New York Evening Post; James L. Wright, Buffalo Evening News; Philip Kinsley, Chicago Tribune.

These members of the Washington corps of correspondents are certain, however, to be only an advance guard of a swarm of newspaper, magazine and "special" writers, not to mention still and movie camera men, which will soon descend upon Grand Rapids and "Coolidge Lodge," as it has already been dubbed. The battle for telephone and telegraph wires at Grand Rapids this summer promises to be a memorable one.

ONE CENT VERDICT IN $100,000 LIBEL SUIT

"Victory for Free Press," Says F. I. Thompson, Former Age-Herald Publisher—Action Brought by Former Prison Warden

A libel verdict of one cent against the Birmingham Age-Herald was awarded Charles R. Davis, former warden of Flat Top prison by a jury in Judge C. B. Smith's court, Birmingham, May 27, in his $100,000 suit against the daily.

The suit was based on an article printed by the Age-Herald, Jan. 30, 1925, concerning the death of Will Clark, a guard at the Flat Top prison, while Davis was warden. The jury deliberated five hours before it announced an agreement. The trial began May 24.

"The verdict is considered a victory for the press of Alabama that is trying to print the truth," said Frederick I. Thompson, former publisher of the Age-Herald, when informed Friday night over long distance telephone to Montgomery of the decision of the jury.

In his closing argument Jim Smith attorney for the Age-Herald declared that the article was not libelous and declared that it did not harm Davis' character. He called upon the jury to uphold a free press in Alabama.

Attorney Beddow for the plaintiff demanded that the jury award Davis the full $100,000 in compensation for alleged character defamation.

FRAUD AD LAW MADE MORE STRINGENT

Wisconsin Measure Now Provides Fine and Prison Sentences for Publishers Printing Misleading Food Copy

Wisconsin's statutes against untrue advertising were made doubly stringent recently when the governor signed a new bill creating penalties for "misleading and deceptive" food advertising in the newspapers or other media.

The new statute makes illegal the advertising of food articles, when such advertisement contains "an assertion which is untrue, deceptive or misleading." In addition, it makes unlawful the advertising of any food products that is of an inferior grade to that established by common understanding or law, if such inferiority is not definitely stated.

Newspapers violating the law are subject to fines of from $50 to $200 and their publishers are subject to from 30 to 60 days in jail or to both fine and imprisonment, as are the advertisers of the product.

ELLING THE "WORLD'S GREATEST COMMODITY"

erge J. Auer, Newly Appointed Herald Tribune Advertising Manager, Tells Some True Stories of Newspaper Advertising Successes—Recalls 25 Years of Space Selling

By PHILIP SCHUYLER

ORGE J. AUER, for the last five ars national advertising manager New York Herald Tribune, was nted May 31 to the post of adver- manager of that newspaper. He eds R. H. Schooley who has joined rculation department to be associ- with Porter Caruthers, assistant ss manager.

Auer, in his new position, has te charge of all advertising in erald Tribune, under the super- o of Mrs. Ogden M. Reid, advertis- rector, and wife of the editor and petor of the newspaper. Mrs. Helen t, recently appointed assistant ad- ing manager, will remain as assis- to Mr. Auer.

Mr. Auer the promotion means ore step upwards in a climb begun rs ago when he was an office boy Schenectady Gazette, on a salary a week.

"Twenty years ago were the days of the eight-page newspaper. Those of us who started then have seen the jump first to 16 and now to 24 and higher. A great many stunts have been originated in those years. In 1905 I played a small part in handling the first fashion supplement ever issued by a small daily. The Chicago Tribune originated the idea in that year, and the Schenectady Gazette tried it out.

"It was a knockout. The Gazette saw its first 36-page paper at that time.

"In Albany, where in 1910 I became business manager of the Knickerbocker Press, I was working on a newspaper that was one of the first to organize a copy service department. That was one of the first really big steps forward in newspaper advertising. I know it went over big in Albany, where, for some time the Knickerbocker Press was alone in its field.

"One of the early ideas that grew out of the copy service department of the Knickerbocker Press, was a series of half page newspaper advertisements for a local photographer. The mother idea was featured in it, long before 'Mother's Day' was started. The copy suggested that 'Mother Would Like to Have Your Picture Near Her, When You Are Far Away,' and also the line 'Keep Your Mother With You Always As She Looks Today.' Another was: 'Don't Go Away Without Mother; Take Her Likeness With You.' Old stuff today, but old enough perhaps to be revived with effect in some places. The Albany photographer built up a large business through the series developed by the Knickerbocker Press. It was an interesting fact of the copy that price was not mentioned in the entire series.

"A stunt that gave me a great deal of fun was pulled on the Atlanta Georgian when I was business manager of that paper.

"Randolph Rose was a liquor dealer of Chattanooga, Tenn., who foresaw the coming of prohibition, and without realizing there might be profit in bootlegging, jumped into the cigar business while the jumping was good. He developed three cigars he called, as I recall it, 'White Armor,' 'Silver Armor' and 'Gold Armor.' Mr. Rose wanted to introduce these cigars to Atlanta. The Georgian showed him how.

"Suddenly on Atlanta streets three horsemen appeared," knights clad in white, gold and silver armor. No hint was given as to what their appearance meant. For one whole week they solemnly paraded on the thoroughfares of Atlanta. Of course public curiosity was whetted. But the secret was kept.

"On the Sunday beginning the next week the Atlanta American, the Sunday edition of the Georgian," printed a full page advertisement. The three mysterious knights seen on Atlanta streets the preceding week were represented photographically as breaking through the printed page of a newspaper. Underneath was a single line, 'They are coming from Chattanooga to Atlanta?

"Then on strips through the twelve pages of the Sunday section, placed at the bottom of each page, smaller reproductions of the mysterious knights were printed, carrying readers through to the back page, where another full page advertisement explained the three knights as emblematic of the three cigars manufactured by Randolph Rose of Chattanooga and now coming to Atlanta.

"You can believe me those three cigars went over with a bang.

"Those were the days before newspapers placed as many restrictions on their advertising columns as they have today. Nowadays, most newspapers would not permit the strips on the bottom of each page.

"We on the Herald Tribune are moderate and conservative in our ideas on advertising restrictions. We do not have the ironclad rules that exist on some other papers. For instance, we are not as hard on black copy, as some newspapers. We believe an advertiser has the right to make his advertisement seen, but, if he offers anything unusually black, we stipple it.

"Most of the restrictions imposed by newspapers have advanced the general cause of newspaper advertising. Newspaper space is pulling today as never before. As another quarter century rolls around many another man will become rich through the purchase of newspaper space.

"We who are in the business see it going on now. Newspapers are playing a vital part in the development of the electric refrigeration business. Oil burner manufacturers in the New York market at least, are finding purchasers among the readers of newspapers.

"A new building material has come on the market, celotex. In New York, the manufacturers of this product are using two newspapers, the New York Herald Tribune and the New York Times. I have been told that one-third of the entire production of celotex is sold in the New York market.

"Thus new business men will forever be coming forward to learn that for national advertising and for local advertising there is no medium that can take the place of the daily paper. There are small corner stores of today that will be big department stores of tomorrow. There are pigmy manufacturers, with brains enough to see the value of newspaper space, who will grow into giants."

Those who have worked over and with Mr. Auer say that it is his ideas that have advanced him in the advertising world, selling ideas he has put into copy, and ideas on management. His progress was plainly rapid. Two years after he first started newspaper work as office boy for the Schenectady Gazette he was promoted to advertising manager of that paper. In telling of it, he modestly emphasized that there was very little for an advertising manager to manage on a newspaper in those days.

After 10 years in Schenectady, Mr. Auer outgrew that city and went to Albany as business manager of the Knickerbocker Press. There he was "discovered" by the W. R. Hearst organization and was named business manager of the Atlanta Georgian. He remained until 1916 when he was brought to New York to be national advertising manager of the New York American. This was in 1916, and Howard Davis, present business manager of the New York Herald Tribune, was then working for Mr. Hearst's American. Mr. Davis and Mr. Auer became friends then. Mr. Davis was first to come to the then New York Tribune. Mr. Auer followed him in December, 1922. His first position was in charge of gravure advertising. Then, in 1924, he was made national advertising manager, the position he last held prior to his present promotion.

This week, answering a query, Mr. Auer frankly confessed that at first he balked at the thought of having a woman for a boss.

"But Mrs. Reid has the keen mind of a businessman," Mr. Auer said this week. "She certainly has an enviable grasp on this business of advertising."

Mrs. Reid, he said, presides over the Herald Tribune advertising staff meetings held every Monday morning. Everybody connected with the advertising staff must be in the office at nine o'clock on these mornings. Those who come in late are fined a quarter, donated to the Herald Tribune's Fresh Air Fund.

Mr. Auer will himself preside over the annual meeting of the Herald Tribune's national advertising staff to be held in New York on June 17-18. On those days all Herald Tribune branch managers will come into New York to report on past business and receive instructions for the future.

$200,000 IS BID FOR PORTLAND TELEGRAM

Solitary Offer Received from Portland News for Bankrupt Daily—Employes Seeking to Raise Larger Sum

Only one bid, that of $200,000 submitted by the Portland (Ore.) News, was offered for the Portland Telegram, bankrupt daily, on May 28, the date set for receiving bids by Amedee M. Smith, receiver for the Telegram. At the request of Robert T. Platt, attorney representing the United States National Bank and associates, creditors of the Telegram, action in the matter was withheld until June 1.

Adjournment was taken to permit creditors to study the bid and prepare what representations they may desire to make to the referee, though final judgment in the matter rests with him.

The bid by the Portland News was accompanied by a certified check for $30,000.

After the opening of the solitary bid, employes of the Telegram, represented by Harry C. Frye, chairman of employes' organization, presented a petition urging delay of not less than 10 days nor more than 15 days in which to perfect an organization and obtain further subscriptions for stock, which would permit the employes to offer a bid greater than the one received.

Final disposition of the Telegram property was again postponed June 1 after a meeting at the office of A. M. Cannon, referee in bankruptcy, which was attended by representatives of the creditors, J. E. Wheeler, holder of title to the stock: the present employes of the company and the Portland News, whose bid of $200,000 is the only one which has been received.

The matter was put over until 10 o'clock Friday morning, after it had been stated that there was a possibility that the employes by that time would be able to tender a bid in excess of the one now on file.

MERGER OF BIRMINGHAM AGE-HERALD WITH NEWS EFFECTED BY HANSON

Price Unannounced but $2,000,000 Bond Issue Authorized, $900,000 to Be Issued Immediately—Both Papers to Be Printed in News Plant

BIRMINGHAM, ALA., June 1.—Formal announcement of the sale of the Birmingham Age-Herald to the

Victor Hanson

Birmingham News was made in the Age-Herald on Wednesday morning June 1, and in the News on the afternoon of the same day. No reference was made in the announcement to the consideration paid for the paper and Victor H. Hanson, publisher of the Birmingham News and chief stockholder in the purchasing company refused to make any definite statement. It was stated that at no time would the purchase price of the property be announced. Most of the stock in both papers belongs to the Hanson interests.

However, a $2,000,000 authorized six per cent bond issue by the Birmingham News was announced by the First National Bank of Birmingham, $900,000 of which is to be issued immediately, the purpose of the issue being to pay the consideration for the Age-Herald and buy additional equipment. This announcement gives some idea of the approximate price paid for the Age-Herald properties.

Ninety per cent of the stock in the Age-Herald was acquired by the News in the sale negotiated on March 7 by E. D. DeWitt with B. B. Comer, Donald Comer and Frederick I. Thompson. The other 10 per cent has since been bought from R. H. McIntosh and Robert R. Meyer. The News now owns 100 per cent of the stock in the Age-Herald but will operate it as a separate corporation.

Victor Hanson came to Birmingham on Feb. 1, 1909, purchasing a fourth interest in the Birmingham News. Since that time he has acquired full ownership of all three of the papers that were operating in Birmingham at that time, the News, the Ledger and the Age-Herald.

The morning paper will be published as the Age-Herald, the evening paper as the Birmingham News and on Sunday the two papers will be consolidated.

Victor Hanson will be publisher of both papers and will have as his assistant James E. Chappell who for the past several years has been assistant to the publisher of the News. Charles M. Fell will hold the position of managing editor for both morning and evening papers. E. M. Henderson will be managing editor in charge of the evening and Sunday papers, Jack Young, formerly with the Philadelphia Public Ledger comes to Birmingham to take charge as managing editor of the morning paper.

Judge Charles Feidelson will be chief editorial writer for the morning paper, A. B. Bealle and Seymour Ransom will continue as editorial writers for the afternoon and Sunday paper.

There will be one advertising department with George Biggers as managing director. There will be no changes in the personnel of the business office with the exception of a few additions to the personnel to take care of the increased business.

The National and classified advertising will be treated as a unit morning and evening. Classified advertisers will be given the full 24 hour service. The management of the now consolidated papers expects that the circulation will boil down to 120,000 daily and 130,000 on Sunday or thereabouts.

A portion of the formal statement of E. D. DeWitt who managed the sale follows:

"On March 7, 1927, the undersigned purchased the controlling interest in the Age-Herald from Messrs. B. B. Comer, Donald Comer and F. I. Thompson, with their full knowledge and approval that he was acting for the Birmingham News company, and that the property would be turned over to the News on June 1.

"This day the undersigned has transferred all his rights, title and interest in and to the Age-Herald to the Birmingham News company. These two great newspapers will be combined and both will be published out of the modern plant of the News." The publishing offices and a portion of the plant of the Birmingham Age-Herald have been moved to the Birmingham News building and on June 1, the Age-Herald appeared for the first time with its new line on the head "Morning Edition of the Birmingham News."

W. A. Carns will be mechanical superintendent in charge of both papers. The News has moved four of the type-setting machines to their plant, making a total of 27 now in their batery. They also moved one Scott Double Sextuple Unit Type Press, supplementing their own equipment of two Goss decuples and one Goss single width quad. They will use the one plant for both papers.

The News was started in 1888 by Rufus N. Rhodes. Victor Hanson bought a fourth interest in it in 1909. In 1910 Mr. Hanson bought the majority interest, Mr. Rhodes having died, and Frank P. Glass became associated with him. In 1920 Mr. Hanson and associates bought out Mr. Glass, and in the same year they bought out the Birmingham Ledger.

Mr. Hanson's formal statement on the purchase of the Age-Herald follows in part: "Beginning with this issue the Birmingham News formally and publicly assumes ownership and control of the Birmingham Age-Herald. Future issues of the paper will be printed in and issued from the plant of the News. The weekday editions of the Age-Herald will continue to be published under that name. The Sunday edition will be merged with the Sunday edition of the News, beginning with the coming Sunday, though the consolidated paper will carry the title lines of both papers. Every effort will be made to make the morning paper all that Birmingham could expect of its oldest newspaper.

"Without in any way depreciating the News content of the newspapers, rather improving it in many respects, numerous economies in operation can be effected through the use of one plant instead of two and one complete group of machinery and equipment, instead of two. In addition, the joint operation will add efficiency and serve to improve the product. These economies, according to plans already well advanced, will be passed along to the reading and advertising public, through the establishment of low rates for joint use of the two papers both by subscribers and advertisers." Negotiations for the merger were handled by Palmer, DeWitt & Palmer.

NEWS AGENCY MEN GET "LUCKY" ASSIGNMENT

Howe, McCann and Hillman Sail on U. S. S. Memphis to Report Capt. Lindbergh's Trip Home—Editors Question Play of the Story

James P. Howe, Associated Press; William Hillman, International News Service, and Charles M. McCann, United Press Association, drew the lucky assignment this week and sailed Friday evening on the U. S. S. Memphis, bringing Capt. Charles A. Lindbergh home from his European triumph.

Howe is the son of Ed Howe, former editor and owner of the Atchison (Kan.) Globe, and known widely as the "Sage of Potato Hill." McCann has been in the U. P. London office some nine years.

Howe may joke with the young flyer about the magnificent offer his father made in the Atchison Globe in 1910 of $1,000,000 for a non-stop flight across the Atlantic Ocean. Ed Howe has declared that he had forgotten all about his promise, but when he was reminded of it he was not worried. He joined in the unanimous praise of Lindbergh and declared he was sure the kind-hearted young man would not hold him to his word.

While plans continued for the elaborate reception of the young air hero in Washington, editors began to question whether or not the story was being over played.

Julian S. Mason, editor-in-chief of the New York Evening Post, in an editorial printed June 2, declared, "We are overplaying Lindbergh as badly as we ever over-played a murder trial.

"Of course, we are entering the dog days," he wrote, "and topics of supreme interest are scarce. But that hardly absolves us from publishing overwhelmingly repetitious details about the gallant New York-to-Paris flyer.

"We may well make his own countrymen sick of him before they see him. If he were not as good as he is, we would have spoiled him long ago."

Ralph Turner, assistant news manager of the United Press, said there had been "surprisingly little fault found by editors of the amount of wire space being given over to the Lindbergh story."

"I don't think the story has been overplayed," he said.

SENATOR HITCHOCK MARRIES

Former U. S. Senator Gilbert M. Hitchcock, publisher of the Omaha (Neb.) World-Herald and Miss Martha Harris of Memphis, Tenn., were married in that city June 1. After the reception Senator and Mrs. Hitchcock left for New York and will sail for England to spend the summer.

Alfred Segal Comes from Cincinnati Post to Find Human Interest on Broadway for New York Evening Telegram—Has Written 2,000 Stories in Four Years

By PHILIP SCHUYLER

IDESPREAD inter-city exchange of newspaper reporters might not be a idea.

suggested itself this week, after an view with Alfred Segal, "loaned" to New York Evening Telegram by the Cincinnati Post to cover the Snyder- trial, and now being used to dis- r human interest on Broadway.

r. Segal might be called an authority human interest stories. Forty-three s old, he has had 24 years of news- er experience. During the last four s he has written under his by-line e than 2,000 human interest stories. has them cut out and pasted in a scrap k.

Just write the way you do in Cin- nati," was the order given to Mr. al when he came to New York. When Snyder-Gray trial was over he was to make his own assignments.

few additions to Mr. Segal's scrap k therefore will include the story of a nk Mr. Segal saw in a New York ter, and the opinion of the prohibition ctor at the sight. Mr. Segal has also rned over the destruction of a church ple, being torn down to make way for kyscraper. He has followed the flight a bullfinch, lost from a New York rtment. He has picked out stories no er reporter has been sent to cover h, for instance, as the reunion of duates of an east side public school.

I couldn't sleep the first night I was in w York," Mr. Segal has confessed, destly. "I was so nervous. I felt t I was going up against giants and uld be devoured."

That was six weeks ago. This week . Segal said:

'I don't know how many stories the w Yorkers are missing, but I do know have found some. I'm sure if New rk newspaper men went to Cincinnati y would find lots of things we, too, are erlooking.

'New York and Cincinnati are very ch alike. The same things happen in cinnati that happen here. But it seems ne of the good things are overlooked.

'I know it surprises me to go through New York newspapers every day and stories which seem to be worthy of ter treatment than has been given to m. That would be true of Cincinnati o, of every other city in the country. e don't get everything even in the small vns.

'Working in Cincinnati is just about same as in New York. The only dif- ence is that I have been working in cinnati so long that I have acquired re or less of a clientele, people who call up and tell me about stories. Here I ve to dig them up.

'For a Memorial Day story, for in- nce, I didn't know any old Civil War teran in New York. I know them in cinnati. Instead I had to look in the ephone directory. There I found the me of a Society called the Loyal gion, and tried it out to see if it wasn't some way connected with the Civil War. re enough, it was a club of old Civil ar officers. I found the aged secretary re, keeping the records, now largely a ord of deaths. The office was on ssau right near the busy whirl of Wall reet. The dramatic contrast between old secretary keeping his books and nearby financial district made what med to me a good story.

'No, you can't really analyze a human erest story. You can't merely name ingredients for others to slap together. is the quality of vision in the man who ites the story. You can't tell what man interest is. It is in the heart of writer himself.

'The writer of human interest must ve been through many experiences, st know the gamut of human emotions. think a newspaper man or woman st be at least 40 years old before he or she can see human interest clearly.

"Sob-sisters cannot write human interest. Most of what goes under that name is shallow, because it is turned over to young girls."

In Cincinnati, Mr. Segal conducts the

Alfred Segal

Cincinnatus column daily on the Post. It was through this column that Mr. Segal started a movement in 1923 for non-partisan city government. The following year the people voted for city management. The column has thus its political influence, but Mr. Segal said he preferred to have it chiefly concerned with human interest and philanthropy.

"When there is a golden wedding in our town," Mr. Segal explained, "we comment on the blessings of happy married life. If a man is killed at work, we point out the heroism in doing the daily task well, no matter how small it is.

"The comments which bring in the largest response in letters from readers are those which have what might be called a spiritual aspect. Not religious, exactly. Well, yes, religious in a broader sense, the broadest sense.

"We are not afraid of handling religion in our column. We will comment as we have on occasion, on the death of a nun.

"We always plead for religious tolerance. We try to point out the best in all religions. When the Jews or Catholics have their holidays, we try to rationalize the symbolisms for our readers.

"Then in Cincinnati we also have a race question that you don't have in New York. Cincinnati is a border town between the North and South. Usually negroes are never noticed there unless they commit some crime. In our column we try to persuade people to show race tolerance. We are always glad to write about a negro man or woman who has accomplished something, achieved success."

Mr. Segal was asked what he thought was the best human interest story he had ever written.

"It was a story," he recalled, "of an old widower 90 years old. His name was James Ring, and he was living at the old men's home. On his 65th wedding anniversary he took a picture of his dead wife and put it in his pocket. Then he walked down from the old men's home to the Galt House, the old hotel he and his wife had come to on their honeymoon from Liberty, Ind. Once at the old hotel, he went up the stairs and sat down near the room, took the picture from his pocket, and kissed it and kissed it."

In New York, Mr. Segal said he is having more or less of a holiday, although he declared newspapermen have told him he is breaking all union rules.

"In Cincinnati evening newspaper men get to work at seven o'clock in the morning and work until 5. I have worked so long on the Post that I get the extra privilege of coming to work at eight o'clock and staying until 6. In New York, I understand most evening newspaper men don't start working until nine o'clock in the morning.

"And I am also told that if a man handles one story in a day, everybody is satisfied. Where I come from we work on any number of stories. We have no specialists there. Everybody just digs for news."

On the Cincinnati Post, in addition to conducting the Cincinnatus column, Mr. Segal writes a daily signed human interest story, and also runs a humorous column called "The Village Gossip." In his spare time he handles assignments.

Mr. Segal has visited New York before and has come here also on assignments. He covered the Democratic National convention at Madison Square Garden, and also came here to report the arrival of the Carpathia after the Titanic disaster. After the war, he was sent to Europe, and wrote daily human interest stories about the Cincinnati soldiers at camps waiting to be sent home.

Just now, he told me this week, he is anxious to get back home to Cincinnati. Six weeks is long enough to live in New York.

Now he is thinking about the home he owns in the Cincinnati suburb, Mrs. Segal, and their three sons, Joseph, 18, and attending the University of Cincinnati, Bernard, 16, and Millard, 13.

"No," Mr. Segal contradicted emphatically. "They are not going to be newspaper men, not if I can help it."

Yes, Mr. Segal repeated, he is most interested right now in getting back home. He might like New York if he was younger.

"I haven't seen many houses since I have been in New York," Mr. Segal concluded. "Most of the newspaper men I have met live in flats.

"I called on a friend of mine here, who, in an evil moment, left Cincinnati to come to New York as a publicity man. I rode up Fifth Avenue on a bus to 168th street, and turned down my friend's street, passed rows and rows of jail-like houses. The last jail was my friend's home.

"'So this,' I said to him, 'is what you left Cincinnati for.'

"'Well I got more money,' my friend rejoined.

"'And that,' said I, 'is all you got.'"

Mr. Segal is going back to Cincinnati.

TEXAN SUES A. P.

Asks $100,000 Damages for Story of Legislative Investigation

J. Frank O'Rourke, former secretary of the Texas prison commission during the Ferguson administration, has filed suit for $100,000 against the Associated Press. He seeks damages from the A.P. because of an Austin dispatch of last Oct. 22 in connection with legislative investigation of the state prison system.

At the same time O'Rourke sued for a similar amount Lee Satterwhite, former speaker of the Texas house, who was a member of the investigating committee, and nine other legislators. Previously O'Rourke had filed suits asking $100,000 each, against the Dallas News and Fort Worth Star-Telegram. R. L. Henry, his attorney, said suits might be filed also against papers in El Paso, Austin and San Antonio. All suits so far have been filed in Houston.

FORM-SHEETS THAT SAVE NEWSPAPER WASTE

Simplicity Marks Most Report Blanks Used by Circulation Departments to Record Daily Busine
Following Articles Will Describe Other Departments' "Red Tape"

WITH this issue EDITOR & PUBLISHER begins a series of articles the intention of which is to give a birdseye view of the newspaper business office practices and routine by which the publisher is informed of the daily condition of his institution. The subject will be treated under several main headings, beginning with the circulation department and then taking up the routine paper-work of the display and classified departments, then the mechanical departments, and finally the summary sheets in which the publisher gets, in a weekly or monthly nutshell, the high-spot picture of the period just closed, compared with a similar period last year.

In most instances, the forms which will be reproduced will tell their own story. They will be printed legibly so that newspaper executives who note a method which they think superior to their own may have before them a working model which can be easily followed. Most of the forms have the virtue of simplicity and the comments of the publishers who supplied them at the request of this paper indicate that newspapers have not permitted themselves to be deeply entangled in office red tape.

This applies especially to the circulation departments. Fairly elaborate systems of book-keeping are maintained to insure prompt and complete service to dealers, carriers, and subscribers, but the reports of the circulation manager and his subordinates to the front office usually tell their whole story in a few lines, written in a few minutes.

From the mass of submitted material, half a dozen representative forms have been selected.

Unique among the circulation reports is that of the Ithaca (N. Y.) Journal-News, which in its circulation, as well as other departments, adheres to the 3 x 5 card whenever practicable. The circulation manager's report on this paper is contained on such a card and gives in half the space afforded by other newspapers' forms considerably more information than some of the larger types. This small city daily is largely carrier-delivered and mail subscriptions, and of course, considerable less news-stand and street sale distribution than is found on larger city operations. Information which this card affords that most of the others do not include, the number of new subscribers and number of stops daily, both for city and for mail circulation, and a comparison of the day's circulation under the principal divisions with the same day of the previous year.

Fig. 2.—This is the daily picture of circulation, press-room waste, and cash receipts laid before the publisher of the Raleigh Times by his circulation manager. The form is on newsprint, 8½ x 11, punched for looseleaf binding.

Another unusual form is that used by the Raleigh (N. C.) Times, the publisher of which, John A. Park, has made an intensive study of newspaper accounting in all phases. His circulation form is printed on newsprint, 8½ x 11, and punched at the top for loose-leaf ledger binding. His operation is about twice the size of the Ithaca paper's but the data noted is similar, with the exception that cash receipts for the day from all circulation divisions, and a cumulative daily total for the month are also given. Other data on this sheet is a condensed press-room and waste paper report and a classification of unpaid circulation.

Three separate forms are used by the Detroit News to keep its high command apprised of circulation development—a daily circulation statement, a Sunday edition statement, which is filed each Monday, and a weekly report, which presents compactly the data commonly called for in the daily summaries. The News is the only newspaper which has so far submitted a weekly circulation report blank among its forms. The daily blank carries one line which is characteristic of metropolitan practice and not often found on the forms of smaller papers—a report on the weather, which is reflected far more promptly and evidently in the large city daily's street sales than in the small town's carrier-deliveries. The News form is also unique in that it distinguishes between waste paper which is folded and waste which has to be bagged for disposal—not an unimportant item in a plant whose daily production usually exceeds 300,000 papers of 48 to 64 pages.

The Sunday paper report belongs exclusively to metropolitan operations of the Detroit News class. It sum ne evening are classified as "City" and Suburban and Out-of-Town." Another nusual feature of these blanks is the no-ition not only of the day's weather, but f the weather on the corresponding day f the previous year and of any special vents which might have a bearing upon irculation. Comparisons are afforded with ne circulation of the corresponding day f the previous year and of the last pre-ious weekday or Sunday issue.

Noticeable on most of the circulation eport blanks which have been sent to DITOR & PUBLISHER is the lack of pro-ision for "Remarks," under which com-ent might be made to clarify conditions ot wholly revealed by the statistical re-ort. The apparent underlying reason or this omission is the feeling that such space might frequently be used for in-enious excuses for poor performance. Many of the blanks used by other de-artments have a "Remarks" space, which indicates that the privilege of comment is not abused under competent supervision, and when carefully guarded, permits of more intelligent reports.

No attempt can be made in this brief summary to detail the reasons for the apparent importance of certain data to some papers, when others ignore it completely. Sometimes the reason is obvious, but in other cases it is ascribable to local and peculiar conditions. EDITOR & PUBLISHER will be glad to answer promptly any questions relating to these forms, and if the desired information is not immediately available, to obtain it at first hand from those competent to furnish it.

IVY LEE VISITS MOSCOW

Russian Problem "Psychological," Is Press Agent's Quoted Comment

The following dispatch from Berlin was published on the ticker service of the Exchange Telegraph, in London, on May 18: "Mr. Ivy Lee, Director of the Press Department of the Standard Oil, Pennsylvania Railroad, Harriman and other American concerns, has recently passed through Berlin on his way to Geneva from Moscow, in which latter city he spent a week and had conversations with a number of prominent Soviet leaders including Rykoff, Litvinov and Tomski. His visit to Moscow is connected here with discussions of Japanese industrialists with the Russians, which have awakened considerable American interest. Mr. Lee declares he discovered in Moscow an earnest desire for the re-establishment of connections with America. He says the Russian situation has been best summed up in the words of the German Reichsbank President, Dr. Schacht: 'The Russian problem is a problem of pyschology.'"

"ISOLATE LINDBERGH" ORDERS WENT AWRY

Carefully Laid Plans of New York Times Men Wrecked by Impact of Mob at Le Bourget Fiel- Battle to Get News to U. S. Told

Edwin L. James, Paris correspondent of the New York Times, in a dispatch printed Friday, May 27, described in detail the difficulties encountered by newspaper men at Le Bourget flying field in covering the historic landing of Capt. Charles A. Lindbergh, New York to Paris flyer.

He himself, with other Times' reporters, had received orders to "isolate" the successful aviator in order to get Lindbergh's story, which the Times had contracted for. How well they succeeded, Mr. James told in the following manner:

PARIS, May 26.—There come moments in every newspaper man's life when he is all but overwhelmed by a feeling of his insufficiency to tell what he has seen—when superlatives seem mere inadequacies.

That happened to this writer once on Armistice Night in the martyred city of Verdun. It happened again the other night when Captain Charles A. Lindbergh landed his plane on the airfield in Le Bourget to be welcomed by a reception committee of 150,000 people gone suddenly insane with joy. Four days later I still retain bruises, which are passing, but memories which will never pass.

When people talk this week about Captain Lindbergh's flight one hears over and over, the question, "But you were at Le Bourget?" It is considered the mark of an extra privilege to have witnessed one of history's greatest mob scenes.

Official programs, formal reception committees, a regiment of soldiers, stout steel fences — all were enveloped and swept under a human sea when all those present, in one swift instant, took it into their collective heads to help welcome the aviator who became great that night.

The reporters assigned to cover Captain Lindbergh's arrival will not forget that night. And neither will they forget one of the toughest mobs they ever tackled. The Battle of the Argonne was a simple matter compared to it.

The Paris bureau of the New York Times had made elaborate preparations to cover the event. The preparations were so elaborate that they almost—perilously almost, as will be shown here—left the editors back in Manhattan in the lurch.

We had arranged complicated telephonic communications. We had made handsome relay plans to rush parts of the story to Paris, over six miles from Le Bourget. We had a fine automobile ready to bring the aviator back to the capital to give his own story for which the New York Times had made a contract. We had stenographers ready to take it down. We had photographers with a battery of cameras and many plates on the spot.

Oh, it was a wonderful plan. Only when the story broke it was not worth one paper franc. Not even complete official documents for entrance to the field were worth while, for an ordinary police card was enough to begin with.

With everything set as described, Percy Philip, Carlyle MacDonald, Harold Callender and myself, plus our office clerk, named Maloussey, went out to the scene of the conquest at 6 o'clock.

We had planned to be smart and have dinner at the airport restaurant so as to be free and fed before 7:30 o'clock, the earliest hour at which Captain Lindbergh was expected. The restaurant will hold about fifty people and 5,000 had the same brilliant idea we had.

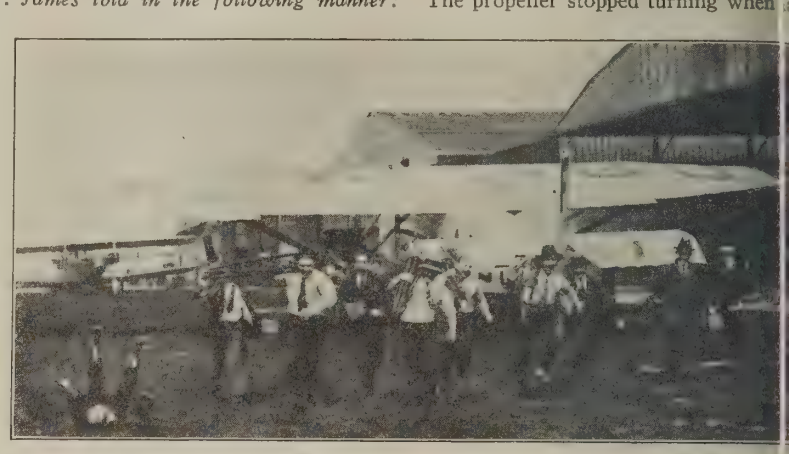
When we were through with dinner, Philip took his job at the elbow of the man representing the Commercial Cable Company, which had its own wire into Paris—only it did not stay open. There was Philip, all set and not to be moved, ready to choke the poor operator if any one else's bulletin of the aviator's arrival got out ahead of ours. Maloussey was to signal him from the corner of a building when the plane touched the ground. Great headwork that! MacDonald, Callender and myself went out on the field, ready to escort Lindbergh to the waiting automobile—mostly in triumph—before the eyes of several hundred envious confrères.

Honestly, that was our plan, and it looked all right at 7 o'clock—and, anyhow, those were our orders from New York. The editor said "isolate" Captain Lindbergh, and we were ready.

In order to make entirely sure of keeping the grounds and the crowd in order, a regiment of soldiers with rifles and bayonets and 700 Paris policemen supplemented the field's usual staff. Yes, the authorities had made great preparations, just as we had.

Along about 8 o'clock the crowd began to grow. MacDonald took a look around and estimated that 10,000 people were round about, standing alongside the airfield.

There was—note that I say there was—the very strongest fence, some seven feet high, with spikes on the top, which up to that night had kept out every one who ought not to enter. The gate was guarded by twenty policemen who let pass those who had credentials; which meant any card with your picture on it.



By 8:30 some thousands of people had got into the field and were kept in orderly line along the edge of the big concrete landing floor.

In front of the soldiers stood a row of some fifty cameras and motion picture machines which were aligned under the direction of a precise and pompous Colonel. And off to one side was the official Reception Committee, engaged in deciding at what hotel they were going to put the evening's hero. They also were deeply planning to "isolate" him and to see that those New York Times reporters did not do any "isolating." Well, if we did not they did not. If there was one real tragedy of the evening it was that of the official Reception Committee. Some of them have not seen Captain Lindbergh yet.

Now, that was the scene as the sun went down about 8:30 o'clock and a chill wind began to blow across the field.

The gentleman walking briskly at Capt. Lindbergh's right, according to the Le Bourget camera man, is a reporter. Who he is and how he got over, under or through the cordon of French rifles remains unrevealed.

"Voila Lindbergh" was heard many times during the hours of waiting for arrival at Le Bourget. Each alarm sent the camera crew dashing madly a new quarter, as shown above.

People were beginning to get free for the evening and the crowd started growing. By 9 o'clock there were 50,000 or 60,000.

It got dark and the stars came out, but it was one of those nights that stay kind of dark despite a million stars; or maybe it was the bright lights that made it seem so.

And the crowd kept growing! Then police began getting rougher.

Callender and I figured at this stage that if we wanted to get there to isolate Lindbergh we ought to get from behind those troops. We walked with Mac and walked until the line was thin and there were not many policemen and there were not many lights.

Then we walked behind one big flare where it was dark behind the blinding rays. We made ourselves small and waited.

Ten o'clock struck. A sort of shiver went through the crowd and we were thinking of the tears which were going to be shed, when all of a sudden the thousands were electrified by the sound of a motor. There was a plane up above us somewhere. The landing lights went up. Every one thought it was Captain Lindbergh and a vast silence swept over and through as more than 100,000 pairs of eyes strained. And then the sound of the motor died out and the lights went down.

It was Lindbergh, as was shown by his story later. He had mistaken the location of Le Bourget and gone elsewhere looking for it.

But the crowd did not know that. Their hopes died down and they settled for the inevitable wait until there was no more hope.

Then there was that whirring again. Callender strained his eyes and shouted: "My God, look!"

There, 500 meters above us, was a gray-white monoplane, right over our head. Then it faded and the noise of the motor stopped.

We thought it a hallucination, and a glance at the crowd showed that very few had seen it. Certainly the officer in charge had not, for the lights did not go on.

Then in a moment, cold forgotten, the flares went on, and turning we saw, just as if thrown on a silver screen, a white-gray monoplane, twenty feet from the ground and softly settling.

"Mac" got off first, I was second, with Callender alongside. We raced as hard as we could toward the plane, which landed perhaps 500 yards from we stood. Suddenly we found ourselves fronting the whirring propeller b straight at us.

We tried to halt. Good Lord! crowd hit us like a shot out of a ca The propeller stopped turning when Donald was only six feet away fr

The men from the military side c field had now reached Captain Lind and were pulling him from the We could see he was struggling. H to the ground once and then was o shoulders of a dozen men.

By this time we were jamme against the plane, with a mighty roa hind us. Ducking, we went unde Spirit of St. Louis and then out the tail.

And then we turned to look and s sight words cannot paint. One hu thousand men and women, with p men and soldiers mixed among were sweeping down toward Ca Lindbergh and his plane.

That sight of those countless bol heads between us and the flares can be forgotten. Fences, line soldiers ception committees—all had been lowed up.

And then we saw Captain Lindb with several French aviators tryin fight their way out.

Throwing away their rifles, sol formed a ring around him, only t swept away. One man swung his to free a path for Lindbergh—and hi aviator on the head.

And suddenly we saw that we lost Lindbergh. We knew later tha of the French officers had put his about him, and shoved him into human mass and then wormed out him into a little side building, where lights were turned out and the av was kept for two hours in darkness r than have his protectors take the ris having him mobbed.

"Say," remarked MacDonald, "I the editor who sent that message been here to 'isolate him.' That's I wish."

In the local trading area—the unit found by Mr. Grissell to be the most practical for national advertising—The Detroit News has always maintained its greatest circulation. Here The Detroit News has concentrated 95% of its great weekday and 80% of its still larger Sunday circulation.

The use of The Detroit News in the Detroit trading area assures a complete coverage of the English speaking homes, for here The Detroit News has been a favorite for more than 54 years. Here, too, are the distributing points, the dealers and one-third of the total population of Michigan. In Detroit and The News Mr. Grissell would find the highest development of the principle of local trading territory merchandising.

The Detroit News in its territory not only completely covers the English-speaking homes but is the favorite medium of the dealer and local advertiser. It is the dealer's source of news, information and advertising co-operation.

To sell the Detroit market thoroughly and economically The Detroit News must be used. And it should be used alone, for it, alone, will do the work, enabling you to employ more impressive space at less cost.

CADETT, BRITISH NEWS MAN, SURVEYS HIS YEAR SPENT ON U. S. DAILIES

Finds Our Newspapers Excel in Brightness and Personal Touch But Inclined to Noisiness of Adjective and "Familiarity" —British Papers Dignified, but Often Dull

By MYRA M. WATERMAN

AFTER a little less than a year in the United States, T. T. E. Cadett, of the London Times, and winner of the Walter Hines Page Traveling Fellowship of the English Speaking Union, believes that he knows more about America than most Americans do.

Since June 30, 1926, when his year of travel in the United States began, Mr. Cadett has worked on seven newspapers, done factory labor, lived with students in a fraternity house and watched the workings of Congress. In making a study of American life he has considered it just as important to be on a party with co-eds as to hear Senators. At the University of California he became "one of the boys" to the extent of participating in every activity of the fraternity at whose house he stayed for two weeks. When one of these activities consisted in stealing a fire-axe from a ferry boat Mr. Cadett took such an interest in the proceedings that he still has the axe.

In Chicago he donned a working shirt and did manual labor in the Cyrus McCormick factory, where the working men accepted him as a laborer like themselves.

In the capacity of reporter and feature writer, Mr. Cadett has worked on the San Francisco Chronicle, Wichita Beacon, Chicago Daily News, Atlanta Constitution, Washington Star, Christian Science Monitor and the New York Times. He has seen every section of the country and has made his way among all sorts of people. Keenly alive to every situation, this 28-year-old man has stored many impressions of America. As sub-editor of the foreign department of the London Times, Mr. Cadett will handle American news.

"The average Englishman," he says, "would find no excuse for the crudities of William Hale Thompson, for instance, when he says that if King George were to come to Chicago he would 'punch his snout.' After my stay in Chicago and my meeting with Thompson I can understand why he said such a thing and can make the English people feel that it was not as unpardonable as it appears."

Mr. Cadett believes that the ignorance of Americans about Great Britain is only equalled by the ignorance of the average Britisher about America. The Englishman is inclined to look upon America as New York surrounded by a great deal of vague land. His knowledge of the West, gained from moving pictures, mostly, is no more superficial, however, than is that of the New Yorker who has never been west of Buffalo.

"The greatest mistake that most people make in coming over here," he says, "is to generalize about the country. Only two things can be generalized about. One is the great hospitality of America, and the other is her political apathy. "This latter, he explains, is due to the fact that Americans have little to worry about from politics, rather than that they have a lack of interest in politics as such.

Although he has evinced interest in every form of endeavor, it is the newspapers, that Mr. Cadett, as a newspaper man, has studied most carefully. In comparing the press in America to that of Great Britain, he finds the most startling divergence in the fact that America can not be said to have a national press at all. Divided as she is into so many widely separated sections, American newspapers represent, at the greatest, their own sections. With the loss of a national element in newspapers comes a failing in the efficacy of the editorial as a molder of opinion.

There is more of the personal touch about American newspapers, Mr. Cadett finds. The news is more personal than is news in England, and it is dealt with in more personal a manner. This gives the advantages of brightness and vitality, but also the disadvantages of a possible descent into the vilest vulgarity. "English papers," he says, "have the possible disadvantage of dullness, perhaps, but they have the advantage of dignity."

One of Mr. Cadett's sternest criticisms of the press in the United States is that it has too much power, not editorially, where its power is less than in England, but in the manner in which it takes matters into its own hands.

"In America," he says, "the press is allowed to try a man before he is tried, as in the Snyder case. In England no paper is allowed to comment on trials; it merely gives the details of the news in an impersonal fashion."

In the American press Mr. Cadett finds a tendency to more and more shouting. This, he thinks, will eventually grow so bad that there will be a complete revulsion.

"Now," he says, "America employs so many superlatives that when something important happens there is no way of expressing it."

Large headlines are unknown on the better papers in England. Their place is taken by a placard worn by news-venders, telling the important events of the day in large letters. In this manner the venders make of themselves walking headlines and the newspapers display more conservative type.

As for sensational journalism, Mr. Cadett says: "We have it, but it is not as noisy as in America. The printed matter may be just as vulgar, but it is not displayed so prominently and so does not give such a sense of shock. The whole tenor of life is not so noisy. In England we have tabloids, but they are not so sensational, they're just silly. England's worst is mawkishly sentimental rather than salacious."

Mr. Cadett's knowledge of the English press has been gained through three years' work for the London Times, during which time he traveled in many of the countries of Europe as correspondent.

ART COLLECTION TO CITY

Charles P. Taft, publisher of the Cincinnati Times-Star and Mrs. Taft, have given their valuable art collection, their residence and $1,000,000 to the people of Cincinnati, contingent on the raising of an additional $2,500,000 for the purposes of the Institution of Fine Arts by Dec. 31, 1928.

AND THAT'S HOW COPY READERS GET THAT WAY!

IF copy desk people are as villainous, as empty of humor, as reporters imagine they are, they must have gotten that way. And some light upon how that came about may be found in a recent demonstration in the Sacramento Bee news room.

A spelling bee, conducted at the state fair, suggested the idea, and the head copy reader, taking the same words, played school master to the reportorial staff. Such everyday trick words as accommodate, accumulate, bilious—say, boy, hand me that dictionary a minute, will you?—were tried with rather startling results.

Not a one spelled them all correctly. The highest mark was 85 per cent; most of the answers were between 40 and 60 per cent; and one—the society editor, by the way—had the grand total of 14 out of 50 words right.

In many stores the advertisi partment is up against a situation the buyers always insist upon us their advertising space in one new Demands of this nature create a lem for the advertising office with contracts of other papers on their according to an article in W Wear Daily.

The Boston Store in Milwaukee, had such a problem, the first being so popular that it was mo ficult to persuade a department m to run his advertising in the papers. To overcome this situatio store, about eight months ago, a the following plan:

1.—Space in the first paper wo charged directly to the departme the amount of actual space used.

2.—Advertising costs in the rem seven papers used would be pro among all departments based on th centage of the department's gross to total store gross sales.

This plan, according to R. G. by Walter A. Strong, publisher of the Chicago Daily News, will be headed up through the direction of the research bureau after having been submitted both to the executive committee and the national commission.

"It is proposed that whatever findings are presented and approved by the executive committee will be passed on by the commission and disseminated as shown.

"You will also observe that it is proposed to re-establish the house organ or mouthpiece of the association in the shape of Associated Advertising, which was abandoned last year. A committee now exists to take charge of its rehabilitation on a much broader basis. In addition to this house organ there will be a bulletin service sent out from headquarters on special or highly technical points and also educational booklets or courses as requested, to be directed by the research bureau."

JAMES F. OWENS

Mr. Hume revealed one interesting detail in the course of the interview. It was the original plan of the Detroit members to appoint a "Czar of Advertising," similar to Judge Kenesaw M. Landis, the baseball Czar, he said. When this was put before prominent advertising men such as Stanley Resor, president of the J. Walter Thompson Company, New York advertising agency, and Frank Presbrey, president of the Frank Presbrey Company, New York advertising agency, they balked at the suggestion, declaring that no advertising man would stand for having a dictator to watch over his business.

COL. PAUL HENDERSON

"And so instead of this idea, the suggestion of the research bureau was substituted," Mr. Hume declared. "It was then decided that the function of the bureau would be as a crucible for the crystalization of advertising practices."

The program of the Association of Newspaper Advertising Executives, newspaper departmental of the I.A.A. has been divided by the committee in charge into four general classifications, local display advertising, national advertising, classified advertising, and problems concerning the entire department.

William E. Donahue, manager of local display advertising of the Chicago Tribune, will preside over the session devoted to local display. Speakers at this session to be held Monday afternoon, June 27, will be R. L. Whitman, advertising manager of the J. C. Penny Company, on "Chain Store Merchandising," and Miss Claire Samels, advertising manager of Carson, Pirie, Scott & Co., Chicago, on "The Selection of Media."

The following subjects have been drawn up for open discussion at the local display meeting:

"What are the principal advantages and disadvantages to the advertiser of a 'shopping news'? Are newspapers changing policies relative to the acceptance of advertising from retail stores located in other cities? What are the best arguments to induce independent grocers to advertise to compete with chains? How can a newspaper best help the retail advertiser?

"What service should and should not be extended to the retail advertiser? What market data should be compiled for the retail advertiser? What are the best arguments replying to the idea of a few retail advertisers that advertising is not as effective as formerly? What is the effect of a large volume of bargain advertising on linage and on business generally? What are effective methods of stimulating interest in staff meetings? What are practical methods of developing local linage for light days?

President Carroll will preside over the Tuesday meeting the subject of which will be national advertising. Three speakers will address this session. They will be F. St. John Richards, eastern manager of the St. Louis Globe-Democrat, and president of the Six Point League of New York newspaper representatives on "Co-ordination of the Publication Office and the Special Representative in Developing National Advertising"; Arthur H. Ogle, secretary-treasurer of the Association of National Advertisers on "The Kind of Co-operation that Pays the Newspaper and the Advertiser"; and Steve Kelton, assistant business manager of the Houston Chronicle, on "Methods of Developing More Advertising on a Substantial Basis."

Subjects for open discussion on the general topic of national advertising will include: "How can newspapers check the tendency to place national advertising through retailers? What merchandising service should and should not be extended to national advertisers? Can a small newspaper afford to give merchandising service?

"How important is survey work in developing national advertising? What are the most effective methods of developing national advertising? Is it advisable to obtain a special representative who confines his newspapers to one geographical area? What are the best methods of charging advertising and handling claimed deductions when the advertisement as printed measures less than the order, due to shrinkage?"

Three classified advertising managers will take part in the A. N. A. E. program this year, namely Charles W. Nax, classified advertising manager of the St. Louis Globe-Democrat, and president of the Association of Newspaper Classified Advertising Managers; Charles T. Horn, classified advertising manager of the New York American on "Building Classified and Making it Pay"; and Harry Gwaltney, classified advertising manager of the Milwaukee Journal, "What Classified Advertising Needs Most." This battery of classified executives will be assisted by a reserve corps of 12 classified managers, representing newspapers of varied sizes, types and publication hours which will be present to answer questions in open discussions.

Carl P. Slane, publisher of the Peoria Journal-Transcript, will preside over the Wednesday afternoon session of the newspaper departmental, set aside for the consideration of general problems concerning the entire advertising department. The speakers will be Rhey T. Snodgrass, advertising manager of the St. Paul Dispatch and Pioneer-Press and Roger H. Ferger, advertising manager of the Cincinnati Enquirer.

Clarion-Ledger Publisher Speaks From Experience

WHEN T. M. Hederman, editor and publisher of the Daily Clarion-Ledger, Jackson, Miss., installed the Ludlow system for setting ads and heads, a little more than a year ago, he had two things in mind—clean-cut, attractive pages for his advertisers, and greater production in the composing room. To insure plenty of leads, slugs, and plain rules, he also installed an Elrod. How well these machines have fulfilled his expectations is shown in the following letter:

"We cannot praise our Ludlow equipment too much. With our varied selection of Ludlow typefaces, we can satisfy our most exacting customers. We are handling our ads in much better shape than before, as shown by the improved appearance of our paper.

"The Elrod is giving us entire satisfaction. In fact, now that we have used it for some time, we cannot see how we ever got along without one.

"Since installing the Ludlow and Elrod machines, an increase in production has been noticeable."

Let us tell you how the Ludlow will enable you to increase the effectiveness of advertisements in your paper, and at the same time give you more efficient production in your composing room.

Buffalo the Wonder City of America

Buffalo, N. Y.

Buffalo News
Main St.
Buffalo, N. Y.

Buffalo at present is enjoying a satisfactory employment situation. Conditions have improved rapidly since the winter months and from an employment standpoint the city is now normal or practically so.

Iron and steel industry is enjoying considerable activity. The same is true of the metal trades, automobiles, rayon plants, chemicals and textiles. There is much being done in lake transportation and the demands for farm labor are greater than the supply. Road construction, street repairing and other seasonal outdoor activities are well under-way, with the exception of the building trades which has not received the usual amount of activity this time of the year. The cement industry, which has made particularly rapid strides in Buffalo, is gaining momentum right along.

On the whole Buffalo industries are more active than for some time in the past with consequent increase in employment and a corresponding growth in the prosperity of the people.

Very truly yours,

Everybody's Working in Buffalo

Favorable employment conditions are being enjoyed in Buffalo according to a letter from L. A. McNamara, Buffalo Superintendent of the Division of Employment. There is considerable activity in practically all lines, according to Mr. McNamara, which is keeping people on the pay rolls and purchasers in the stores.

Reports from leading retail outlets are especially favorable this year. In a number of cases all previous selling records in volume and revenue have been broken.

Where people are busy there is business for advertisers who are alert in pressing their claims. Buffalo, therefore, holds forth a most promising opportunity for productive merchandising effort. Will you take advantage of this opportunity?

Varied Industries in Buffalo

Buffalo's prosperity is largely due to diversified industries. When it's hard times for some it's boom times for others. Consequently, good employment conditions are more likely than with only a few industries. 63% of all lines of manufacture are in Buffalo.

SEES RECORD FINANCI ADVERTISING IN 192

Rudolph Guenther, Agency Man, More Money Being Spent f Newspaper Space Than Ever Before

Rudolph Guenther, president of advertising firm of Rudolph Guent Russell Law, Inc., reecntly forecast other record year in financial adverti and asserted the investment trend never more actively determined than the advertising appropriations made 1927 by banking institutions and corp tions engaged in marketing securitie

From an international point of view large number of foreign loan flotati already made in 1927 have tended to scure the century-old problems of ta regulations and restrictions, said Guenther, who interprets the further s plying of European markets with Am can capital as indicative of a new era the political and business relationsh among the nations.

"It is reasonable to believe that 1 will witness the use of newspaper magazine advertising space on a sc never before attained in the history American finance," Mr. Guenther s "This is supported by the fact that t far in 1927 more money has been app priated, generally speaking, for inve ment and so-called institutional adver ing than in the same period of 1926, wh was a record year for all time."

O. C. Harn

Managing Director of "A. B. C." Is Thus Reported In An Associated Press Dispatch:

DETROIT, May 11. (AP)—Mere multitude of circulation does not constitute a sure guide for the advertiser looking for a sale of his products, but it is the "right kind" of patrons that counts, O. C. Harn, managing director of the Audit Bureau of Circulations, told delegates attending the convention of the Association of National Advertisers here.

"We have been passing through a distressing period of indiscriminate buying. Circulation of newspapers and magazines has been infected, with no attendant increase in value, but with decided increase in the cost of advertising.

"You advertisers have but yourselves to blame. Publishers do not want to perpetrate this uneconomic thing, but you force them to do it when you tend to select your list of media from the newspapers solely on the factor of having the largest circulation in the town.

"Make the publishers sell you the elements of their circulation. Don't be afraid to buy the smaller circulation, if the indications are it has a larger proportion of the right kind of patrons."

In Southern California, business firms have for years put into practice Mr. Harn's sound recommendation. Always they have chosen the

A Community Sing in Second Bass

Market advertising has developed into a chorus in the deeper notes. The chain stores took up the lead, evidently believing stentorian tones essential to a hearing, and the local merchants, themselves anxious to be heard, were quick to join in. Today the market page of the ordinary newspaper is, in effect, a community sing in second bass.

The situation is not as it should be. In the first place, wares and prices boomed forth in over-sized, over-black type are more apt to be avoided than heeded. Secondly, grant the reader's interest in an advertiser's message. Even then he is unlikely to reach the end of an illegible type line. Next rises the fact that foodstuffs advertised in noisy fashion do not readily associate themselves in readers' minds with the more subdued, more attractive national advertising fostered by the manufacturers of these products. And last—but most important from the publisher's standpoint—raucous, unattractive advertisements unquestionably tend to cheapen the paper in which they appear.

Needless to say, The Distinguished Newspaper avoids such advertising, realizing that in so doing it is not only maintaining its own high standards, but is likewise making its space more valuable to its market page advertisers. The two pages following demonstrate the practical application of this policy. They show, too, how Linotype Typography enables The Distinguished Newspaper to raise the tenor and profits of its market advertising.

Most Chain Store Advertising Is Too Black

The Result Is a Loss of Legibility and Attractiveness That Cannot Help But React Against It

The average reader's initial contact with a newspaper page is nothing more than a cursory glance. In one fleeting glimpse he determines whether or not he will delve into the contents of the page. From his first impression he decides if he will take the time to read even the heads.

Visualize the likely reaction of an average reader toward a page such as this. There certainly can be little invitation for him to read on. Masses of bold, black type greeting his unexpectant eye are more likely to send him on to another page than they are to stimulate his interest and arouse in him a desire to investigate the contents of the one before him.

Still there are advertisers, particularly on the market page, who persist in the use of over-bold type. Each apparently believes that billboard methods are the only ones which will assure him a hearing. Not one of them gives a thought to the mass effect such ads are certain to produce. The result is the adding of black to black and a proportionate increase of illegibility, as witness the advertisements below and to the right.

Considered individually, these ads are far from attractive, yet they are unexaggerated specimens of market advertising in the ordinary newspaper. The ad below, for example, uses a heavy-toned, hard-to-read type and alternates lines of full faced caps with lines of condensed caps and lower case, and vice versa. The variety of type sizes employed is equally confusing, particularly in view of the ad's lack of balanced arrangement. The border, presumably designed to gain attention, does nothing more than contribute to the advertisement's generally disordered appearance.

The specimen to the right is balanced in arrangement, but little can be said for its legibility. Chiefly accountable for this is the use of large caps in a condensed face, too-heavy rules, and top and bottom signatures reproduced in reverse.

Where Your Dollars Do Their Duty

Successful foodstuff merchandisers, whether they operate one store or a chain, realize that price alone is not a sufficiently strong selling appeal. Accordingly they employ a certain portion of each advertisement in which to tell prospective customers of some featured quality or service. By so doing they reach a clientele that might otherwise be totally uninterested.

Light Face Types Improve Ads

They Make Market Advertising More Attractive and Add to Appearance of Page

How different is the probable reader's reaction to this page of market advertising in comparison with the one opposite. Where the page from the ordinary newspaper repels, this extends the reader an invitation. It is for this reason that the market page of The Distinguished Newspaper is a profitable medium for the advertisers of food products.

The whole difference between the two pages is typographical. Where the one attempts display with the copious use of black type, the other achieves it by a free employment of white space. At the same time, no features of the ads opposite have been sacrificed. These reset specimens, on the contrary, find room for merchandising copy in addition to listing and pricing every item contained in the originals. They utilize the same amount of space in each instance, yet through the employment of more legible type faces, the avoidance of all-cap lines, and a balanced arrangement, these advertisements attain a far greater attractiveness and readability than those opposite.

By way of illustration, consider the ad to the left. The upper signature of the original has been replaced by sales copy under an attention-getting head. Copy has been added to each listing to better describe the item offered and each item and price has been set in smaller, more legible type. The four products of the same brand are grouped for emphasis. The lower signature and simpler rules are unquestionable boons to the ad's effectiveness.

The outstanding improvement is achieved by the specimen below in the discarding of the confusing rule arrangement embodied in its original. In this, too, the type used is more readable and a wide range of sizes has been avoided. Caps and lower case have been employed throughout and room gained for copy in several instances.

The signature shown in the lower left hand corner of this page shows a lighter treatment of the same idea, namely the use of a border fitting to the company name. It is handled thus to maintain an even tone over the entire page.

Interchangeability—Efficiency—Economy

In Linotype composition, interchangeability is synonymous with efficiency and economy. One ad employing a variety of type sizes, or a variety of ads each in a different face, present no problem to the composing room that is Linotype equipped. The run of the hook can be handled quickly and profitably.

Multiple magazines and multiple distribution—Linotype features—make it easy to change from one size to another in a single ad, or from one face to another in a series of ads. It is equally simple to mix faces on the Linotype. The operator can set intricate advertisements without leaving his keyboard.

These superiorities, coupled with the attractiveness and useability of Linotype faces, explain why The Distinguished Newspaper has adopted Linotype methods. They enable it to achieve high typographical standards at the same time it is reducing ever-present production costs.

Applied more specifically, Linotype methods aid The Distinguished Newspaper in making its market page something better than "a community sing in second bass." They put that publication in a position to give its market advertisers more attractive advertising, increase its own value as a medium, and show a sizeable profit on the effort.

KEY TO CONSUMER BUYING ABILITY

Statistical Rating of Counties and Cities for Products of General Appeal, Graded in Six Major Classes of Quality and Cost—An Original, Simplified and Tested Formula from Basic Data

By NELSON H. SEUBERT

Copyright 1927 by Editor & Publisher Company. All rights are reserved and warning is given that reproduction of these results, in whole or in part, without written permission of Editor & Publisher Co., will constitute copyright infringement.

ERMONT, a predominantly rural and comfortably middle-class commonlth, is the third state for which the ly to Consumer Buying Ability" is lished. This series, which began in TOR & PUBLISHER of May 21, has alady given in detail the town and county rlyses for Massachusetts and New mpshire, and will continue each week il every state in the union has been orted.

As stated in the previous two articles, here repeated for the benefit of ders who see this series for the first e, its conclusions are based upon the mise that estimates of consumer buyr ability rest upon two basic elements—ulation and income. These two elents, when properly related, will give close approximation of the potential alth or buying power of any comnity for products whose appeal is gen-l.

But when all the elements which have n frequently used in constructing inces to buying power have been named er—manufactured wealth; farm values; mber of retail outlets, etc.—two basic ments stand out as of prime considerain. They are population and income. ven the human animal in great enough nsity in a certain community with ney above the average, and you have a ying power in that community which ist be reckoned with for a large numr of products.

The following factors commonly used indexes to buying power are subject to rtain criticisms:

vings Bank Deposits—Savings are oftentimes for the proverbial rainy day and do not represent annual or active buying power.

nk Clearings—These figures are limited to certain cities and also are distorted by duplication. The same check may clear through many different cities and be recorded in all of them. The figures are also limited to a checking business.

alue Added by the Manufacturer—These figures are not current enough. All profits may go to a general office in some other city. The same is also true with money expended in sales effort. The figures do not mean that this wealth is passed on to the people in that community and is available for consumer buying.

Value of Farm Crops—These figures do not take into consideration the cost of raising. Bumper crops may mean a loss. They also represent only a part of the population.

Value of Manufactured Products—Margins of gross profit vary greatly in various industries, and also this index is subject to the same criticisms as those of the value added by the manufacturer.

Value of Live Stock—The same criticism as the Value of Farm Crops.

Value of Mineral Products—The same criticism as Farm Crops.

Number of Passenger Cars—Some cars are bought for transportation (Fords), others for business purposes and some for pleasure, hence the figures are not an accurate indicator of the ability to buy luxuries or an indicator for a general buying power index.

Number of Retail Outlets—These indicate accessibility and may help to determine the method of selling. The lack or scarcity of retail outlets might be reason for direct consumer selling or a mail order business. They indicate where purchases are made but not where the people live who buy the merchandise, hence they can only distort any picture of buying power.

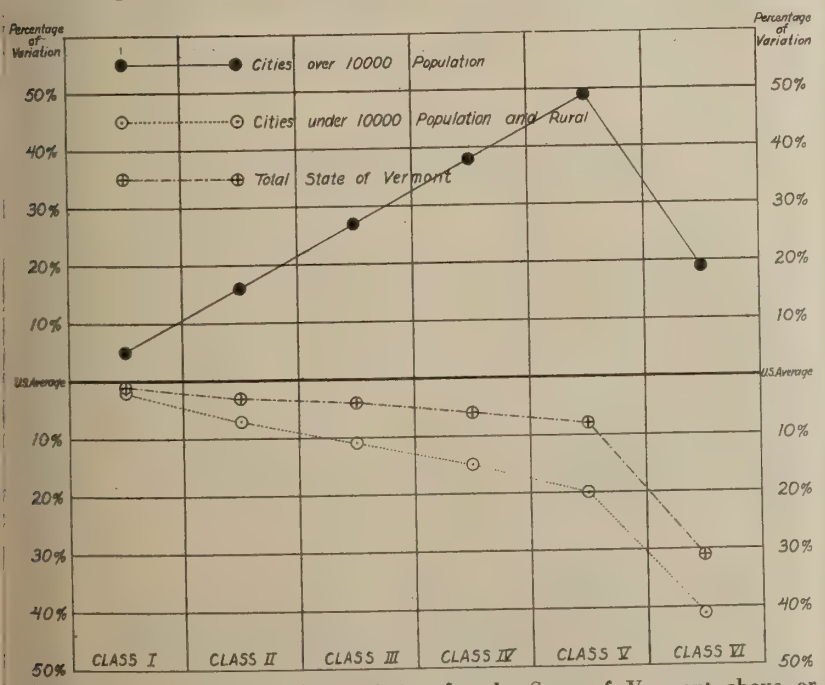
An arbitrary weighting which checks fairly accurately is given to the various classes as follows: In Class I, the class for cheap necessities and bulk staples, percentage distribution of population counts 90 per cent and percentage distribution of income 10 per cent because no matter how much of a necessity an article may be, the money available for buying will have an influence and should be set over against the population figures. For brevity's sake "percentage of population distribution" will hereafter be referred to as "Population" and "percentage of income distribution" as "Income." In the same way quality, high priced luxuries and non-staples of mass appeal should come somewhere near following the figures under Class V because that is a weighting of population and income with income counting 90 per cent and population 10 per cent. Here again the money is the important factor in the luxury products market. Still the density of population will be bound to have its effect because of the way the Browns try to keep up with the Smiths (social demands). Class VI is for the fancy priced exclusive luxuries of high unit value and the weighting is the same as Class V except that incomes of $10,000 and more were substituted for all incomes. The reason for this substitution is obvious.

Here then are the descriptions of the six classifications and their corresponding weighting of population and income:

Class I Cheap necessities and bulk staples. Population 90 per cent. Number of incomes 10 per cent.

Class II Moderate priced necessities and packaged staples. Population 70 per cent. Number of incomes 30 per cent.

Class III Quality priced necessities and staples. Cheap luxuries and low priced non-staples. Population 50 per cent. Number of incomes 50 per cent.



Class IV Fancy priced necessities and staples. Moderate priced luxuries and non-staples. Population 30 per cent. Number of incomes 70 per cent.

Class V Quality priced luxuries and non-staples. Population 10 per cent. Number of incomes 90 per cent.

Class VI Fancy priced exclusive luxuries of high unit value. Population 10 per cent. Number of incomes over $10,000 90 per cent.

The computation of the index numbers was done in the following manner:

The population of the United States is represented as 100 per cent (1925 estimates) the percentage of population in each State, County and City over 10,000 population was figured and carried out four places beyond the decimal point in order to have a figure for the smallest communities. The same process was followed with the "number of all income tax returns" (1924 returns) the total for the United States was represented as 100 per cent, or, carried out four places beyond the decimal point 100.0000 per cent.

To use this chart:

First determine as accurately as possible which of the six classifications best fits your product. The figures under this class in the chart are the only ones that you use. When this is determined, comparison can be made between the buying power of any city or trading area and your sales or advertising circulation by the following method:

Take your sales figures or your advertising circulation figures of the particular city or trading area under consideration. Translate these figures into a percentage of your total figures for the United States. Carry these figures out four places beyond the decimal point (i.e.) if your sales are about 2 per cent, you might have an actual figure something like this, 1.9837 per cent).

The next step is to point off four places in the buying power index which then becomes a percentage of the total buying power of the United States. You now have two comparable percentages. A comparison of these two percentages will immediately show you whether you are placing enough sales or advertising effort on that city or trading area. Any group of cities, counties or trading areas can be compared by merely adding together the figures of the various cities or counties that make up the area or group. Then follow a similar process as outlined.

INSURANCE MAN SAYS NEWSPAPERS ARE BEST

Grigg, Mutual Life Advertising Manager, Declares Them Most Effective Medium for Reaching Homes

Newspapers were rated first as advertising media by B. W. N. Grigg, advertising manager of the Mutual Life Insurance Company, in a recent article in Canadian Insurance.

"Other media have their uses but any product to be brought to the attention of the Canadian public as a whole will be featured in the newspapers first," he wrote. "District managers will supplement this, but the almost universal verdict of advertising men is that the newspaper is the most effective publicity medium.

"The average readers of newspapers are Mr. and Mrs. and the children. They have a heart. They are attracted by a picture with an emotional and at the same time a rational appeal and the advertiser of life insurance must not think that the technicalities of his business interest average readers. They do not.

"In advertising life insurance—

"Be constructive: Feature the benefits of life insurance rather than the penalties following neglect of its privileges. Shun 'horrible examples.' Let us make our advertising attractive not repellant.

"Be tactful: Do no stress too much the amount of business in force. Size is of less consequence than quality. Let us give the public the impression that we are in a friendly competition for results, not bigness.

"Concentrate: Do not experiment with too many advertising devices. Every day sees some new development, 'something different.' Concentrate on a few things. Let the experimenters try the new things."

"Be disinterested: Above all other organizations a life company should exemplify the quality of disinterestedness. In the life insurance business, in the head office, the field and in advertising—He that saveth his life shall lose it: He that loseth his life shall save it."

LOAFING AROUND THE WORLD

E. L. Powell, Now Retired After 39 Years as A. P. Reporter

This freedom, most newspaper men look forward to, is just a little bit of all right.

If you want confirmation get in touch with E. L. Powell, for 39 years a reporter of the Associated Press and now retired, that is, if you can catch up to him. Mr. Powell was in New York this week following a six months' world tour covering 16,000 miles. He was on his way to Portland, Ore., and is looking forward to a trip to be made in the near future to the South American republics.

"I haven't got tired of idleness yet," said Mr. Powell. "I guess I'm not like most tourists. What I appreciate most of all is the freedom I'm getting now from the old grindstone. I even haven't any ambitions to write a book."

Mr. Powell is unlike the newspaper man of the joke who retired when he had $50,000, all but $1 of which he inherited from a rich aunt. He saved his money and now has plenty to loaf on, helped out by the pension allowed him by the A. P.

"The average newspaper man is rather reckless with his money, I think," Mr. Powell continued. "I didn't happen to have any systematic method of saving money. I blundered along, but I always put something by for this chance I'm enjoying now of loafing around the world."

Mr. Powell was graduated from the University of Oregon with the class of 1887. After a short time as reporter on the Portland (Ore.) Evening Telegram, he joined the A. P. in Portland. He later worked in the Chicago and New York offices of the A. P. For the past seven years he was correspondent at Manila.

RUMOR NO DEFENSE

Tulsa Judge Strikes Out Portions of Daily's Libel Answer

The extent to which a newspaper may rely on the wide prevalence of report and rumor in giving their subject matter publicity, was discussed by District Judge T. G. Chambers at Oklahoma City, Okla., in passing on a preliminary motion in a $200,000 libel action against the Tulsa (Okla.) World.

The fact that rumors have been general in the community cannot be pleaded in mitigation of damages by the newspaper giving them publicity, Judge Chambers held, striking certain portions of the World's answer to the petition of Fletcher S. Justice Riley brought his action against the World and State Representative O. O. Owens of Tulsa.

Representatives of allied news agencies, comprising officials of the prominent news distributing organizations of the world, gathered in Warsaw, Poland, May 28, for a two-day conference for consideration of questions of news exchange, transmission facilities, and other topics of mutual interest. Delegates from 25 different countries were in attendance, the Associated Press of this country being represented by its general manager, Kent Cooper.

Speaking at a luncheon in honor of the delegates, Foreign Minister Zaleski of Poland referred to the system of exchange of news among the allied agencies and called them "a great international family, powerful for the promotion of peace and international cooperation."

The next conference will be held in Constantinople in 1929.

CANTON REPOSITORY PLANS NEW PLANT

To Erect Two-Story Structure in Business District and Install New Equipment—Owned by Brush and Moore

Plans have been drawn up for a new two-story brick, steel and concrete plant for the Canton (O.) Repository, recently purchased from George B. Frease by Louis H. Brush and Roy D. Moore. Plans for the structure were drawn up by Mr. Frease before the sale and will be carried out practically without change

LOUIS H. BRUSH

The new plant will have a frontage of 66 feet on Cleveland avenue, 200 on Fifth street, N. W., and 124 feet on Dewalt avenue. The location is in the business center of Canton. Although only two stories will be completed, the sub-structure and steel framing provide for a six-story building.

GEO. B. FREASE

In the plant a new Goss press with eight units in line will be installed. It will be of the mezzanine type and the drive control will be Cline-Westinghouse, with Cline reels.

The stereotype plates for the presses will be mechanically conveyed to the press units, and the rolls of newsprint, of which the Repository uses about 150 carloads a year, will be conveyed from the basement storage rooms by a miniature railway system with switches and turntables. New linotype and other machinery will contribute to make the new plant one of the best in Ohio.

Noted as one of the oldest papers in Ohio, the Repository has the distinction of being the only one among the five oldest papers in the state to have retained its original name. It was in 1815 that John Saxton, grandfather of the wife of President William McKinley, founded the Repository and in one of its earliest issues he chronicled the fall of Napoleon I at Waterloo. After 56 years of consecutive service, Saxton lived to publish in the same paper the story of the fall of Napoleon III at Sedan in 1870.

The Repository Printing Company was incorporated in 1885 by William McKinley, at which time George B. Frease became one of the stockholders, having become editor of the paper at the age of 22 years.

In its new home it will be directed by Louis H. Brush, president; and Roy D. Moore, general manager of the five Ohio newspapers in the Brush-Moore group—The Repository, the Salem News, Marion Star, East Liverpool Review-Tribune, and the Steubenville Herald-Star.

CRIST REWARDS HIS STAFF

In appreciation of the way his staff handled the Lindbergh Atlantic Flight story, Harris M. Crist, managing editor and treasurer of the Brooklyn Daily Eagle, rewarded the city editor, staff photographer, and three reporters for their efforts by sending them letters of congratulation and bonuses. Those who were commended by Mr. Crist for their excellent work on the story of the century were: Edwin B. Wilson, city editor; Martin Kunkel, photographer; and Wilbur Rogers, I. Kaufman, and Frank Emery, the reporters who wrote the stories of the take-off from Roosevelt Field and of the progress and landing of the St. Louis flyer.

THREE STAFF CHANGES MADE BY C. P. A.

William Hard, Lemuel F. Parton, and Owen L. Scott Get New Assignments Following Death of Robert T. Small—Trio Are Well Known

Three important changes have been made in the staff of the Consolidated Press Association, following the death of Robert T. Small.

WILLIAM HARD

William Hard, well-known newspaper writer, joins the staff of the Sunday service of C. P. A. to write a weekly dispatch on national affairs and furnish anecdotal paragraphs on men and events in the news; Lemuel F. Parton becomes special staff correspondent of the leased wire service; and Owen L. Scott, western division news editor, will be relieved of his executive duties in order to permit him to write dispatches from the middle western territory wherever big stories break.

L. F. PARTON

Mr. Hard has covered for newspapers and magazines the outstanding political developments of a large part of the world. He began newspaper work on the Chicago Tribune in 1902 shortly after graduation from Northwestern University with highest collegiate honors.

In a fifteen-year period of writing fo leading newspapers and magazines, M Hard traveled all over the United State and Europe, in India and in other par of the world.

Mr. Parton has had a varied and color ful career as a reporter and editor begir ning on the Chicago Tribune. After cover ing stories in every part of the country, h assumed the duties of city editor of th Los Angeles Herald, later moving on t San Francisco where he became the sta reporter of the Bay District, serving o the Associated Press and then under Free mont Older, and finally as associate edi tor of the San Francisco Bulletin.

Parton covered the mining booms a Goldfield and Cripple Creek, and later went to Central America to search for Toltec ruins. He covered the revolution in Haiti when Nord Alexis was driven out.

When Facism burst on the world Parton was present at its beginnings, after which he traveled through most of Europe and the Levant. Returning to New York, he covered the McMillan expedition in the North and took his turn at the wheel steering the Bowdoin home, to return again to Labrador to meet the world fliers.

Mr. Scott began newspaper work in Wisconsin and received his training in the west with the Associated Press.

Uncle Joe Cannon always was a man of action and affairs. He was not a writer. L. White Busbey, his confidential secretary for twenty years, has made of the great mass of material a most readable and fascinating biography. The manuscript has been specially edited and arranged for newspapers by Charles Willis Thompson.

The result is a series of 15 colorful feature articles covering the whole period of Cannon's career—from childhood, through his boyhood struggles, the years in local politics, the rise to national politics and his outstanding years of service as Speaker of the House of Representatives. Cannon reveals the truth about many important historical incidents, recalling to public intelligence many interesting facts which have hitherto escaped printer's ink.

It's all here, vividly related—Slavery, Abolition, the Civil War, the Lincoln Assassination, Frauds, Bribery, Corruption, Compromise—the work of the Secret Service—the struggle for Tariff Revision—Free Silver—Temperance—step by step to the World War and the League of Nations. With simple honesty and rare flashes of humor Cannon tells us intimately of all the important happenings which transpired during the generation he so gloriously typifies.

Uncle Joe vividly recalls his fifty years of service in Congress, his active and brilliant Speakership, his intimate associations with men of affairs. He reveals facts and incidents which have never found their way into print before. He tells reminiscently of the Presidents he knew—their characteristics—their personalities. Some of the things he tells about are amusing. Some—surprising.

Here, in these fascinating articles, in current history related by one who lived actively through it. One who had a part in the making of that history. One who has been closely connected with all the important political situations in this country during the past five decades. Every article is a BEAT, crammed with news, with facts, with information of first importance. Every article is a historic document, revealing sidelights of political and governmental life in which every American newspaper reader will be interested.

IV.—DOUBLING CIRCULATION IN SIXTEEN MONTHS

By N. E. W. SOUTH

This is the fourth of a series of intimate stories written from "the inside" by a newspaper publisher who, for obvious reasons, cannot disclose his own identity or that of the newspaper about which he writes.

A FELLOW publisher recently wrote me as follows:

"I have been told that while you were with the Blanksburg Evening Eagle as managing owner, you accomplished the rather unusual feat of doubling the paper's net paid circulation within less than sixteen months. I have also been told that you did this without the use of premiums or contests, and that the circulation thus gained is the kind that sticks. Please, how did you do it, if you really did?"

Well, we really did it, all right, and, as I look back on it, I am of the opinion that we were able to accomplish this "rather unusual feat" of lifting the Eagle's daily net paid circulation from less than 8,000 to close to 17,000 within the comparatively brief space of sixteen months—and that, too, without employing premiums or contests—largely because we took first the step that should be taken first in building circulation that sticks. By that I mean that before we ever sent out even one circulation canvasser or in any way asked the good folk of Blanksburg to subscribe to the Eagle, we found out from them just what they wanted in the way of a home town evening newspaper.

I know the sort of evening newspaper that I myself like to read, and it would have been no trick at all to have given the people of Blanksburg just that. But did they want that type, or some other? No one on the Eagle could enlighten me. Every one had his notion about what kind of paper we should get out, but that notion was based almost wholly on personal likes and dislikes; no one had ever made a reader study of the community to find out what it preferred, and the combined editorial, circulation and business office ignorance on this head was abysmal.

And so, I took the first step first, as I have said, and sent out men, not to canvass for subscriptions, but to find out from the people of Blanksburg what kind of an evening paper they would like the Eagle to be.

These men went among all classes of citizens—merchants, bankers, mechanics, clerks, factory workers and coal miners. They spent days in the business, industrial and residential districts, and by and large they called on as many men as women.

And what did these good people ask for?

Well, I think every one who saw the reports, and the data gatherers themselves, were amazed at the predominant demand, which was: "Give us all the church news."

This request came not only from women, but from hard headed business men as well, and it was made by all classes of citizens.

I had carefully instructed our canvassers to get detailed explanations of all answers that seemed interesting, and whenever this answer was made, it usually carried this explanation with it:

"Wants to know not only what the preachers are doing, but about the various auxiliary bodies of the churches, such as ladies' aid societies, men's clubs, Y. W. C. A., Christian Endeavor, sewing circles, etc."

The second most insistent demand was: "We would like all the deaths."

Next came the demand for what is known to us in the harness as society news. "Tell us all about the weddings, the parties, the teas, the dances, and where every one is visiting out of town," is about the way the Blanksburgers put it.

"Oh, we'd like to have the rest of the local news, too—who's been runover by an automobile, who's been arrested, what city council is doing, the fires, and all that sort of thing. Oh yes, we want that, too."

State news? Yes, but only the most important. National news? Same answer. Foreign news? No, we don't care what's happening in Europe, Asia and Africa. Politics? We're tired of it except at election time.

Comics? Oh, you mean the funnies? Yes, indeed, we want them. We also want a continued love story. What kind? Well, you know, er—er—well, the kind that tells about young people today and their adventures. Anything else? Well, yes, the daily radio programs and a cross word puzzle.

But if you couldn't have all these things, what would you choose? Why, all the local news, of course, and then the funnies!

This was the composite answer of several thousand people, and I'll admit that when I found the leading demand was for "all the church news" I was somewhat nonplussed. But when I learned that in the city of Blanksburg, with a population of 35,000, there were more than 50 churches, I began to understand how seriously the people were taking their religion and the reason for their request for "all the church news."

Here was the actual "low down," and just as soon as we could turn around, we began publishing "all the church news" in the Eagle, all the deaths, and every time any one gave a party or left town for a day or two or longer his or her name got into the society columns.

The outstanding local news we featured on page one. Hitherto, the first page had been given over almost wholly to national and foreign news, with the local news placed helter skelter among the ads on the inside pages. Now page one became an almost solid local news page; a national or foreign happening had to be overwhelming to get there, and it also had to be almost as important to make an inside page. In other words, the town had asked for a local newspaper, and we gave it just that.

Political news had also been featured for years; now it was all but given the gate, and not a soul whimpered, not even the dyed in the wool politicians. A full page of comics made its appearance, and Beatrice Burton began giving the fiction devotees the modern love stories they yearned for.

For about two months we got out this sort of paper, and then, believing that it had found itself, we started a territory wide canvass for circulation. Meantime, word of the new Eagle had spread by word of mouth, and without any active work on our part the circulation had begun to creep upward.

The canvassers were instructed to talk the new type of paper and to ask for trial subscriptions only.

"Take the Eagle for a few weeks, that is all we ask," they said to business men, to factory workers, to women in the homes. "Then, if you are not satisfied with the local news we are giving you, and the funnies and the continued love story, stop the paper and it will be all right with us."

Every day on that basis they gathered them in in large numbers. And when the trial period was over—they stuck.

They stuck because they were getting the kind of paper they wanted—and also because the paper was delivered to them at the time they wanted it.

When I went to Blanksburg I found that the paper was being delivered in large part after dinner. Again and again, when surveying the town to find out the sort of paper it wanted, citizens would say:

The paper comes to us too late. We don't want it after dinner. That's when we want to go to the movies or out riding in our car. We want it before dinner when we have time to read it."

The voice of the people again—and so I moved up the press time of the Home edition a full hour and told the circulation manager that if life was as sweet to him as it was to me, he'd see to it that the Eagle reached every subscriber in Blanksburg and its trading territory at least an hour before the dinner hour, which for our purposes I fixed at six o'clock.

I think this early delivery of the paper did as much as the contents to turn trial subscribers into permanent readers. In other words, Old Man Service packed his old punch and scored the usual K. O. for his backers.

Of course, to accomplish before dinner home distribution over a territory reaching fifty miles to the west, fifty-five miles to the east and southeast, forty-five miles to the south, and thirty miles north, we had to employ fast motor delivery and a corps of independent carriers in every town within these limits where we had a considerable number of subscribers. But the expense more than paid for itself in increased advertising from Blanksburg's merchants, who soon began to feel the effects of the greater and wider distribution of the Eagle. Given hard surface roads, any enterprising evening paper can make similar quick distribution.

Oh, yes, we delivered the Home Edition—that is, the final edition—to these trading territory towns as well as in Blanksburg itself, and that helped to hold the circulation there. The readers felt just a wee bit pleased to think that they were getting as late an edition as the folks right in Blanksburg. We gave these smaller towns their local news, too, please do not forget. That was the basis of our circulation canvass therein, that was what the people there asked for, and, given that, they came with us as readers, and remained on as such.

That about tells the story, with the exception of the R. F. D. list. For years it had been the practice on the Eagle to let a name, once it got on the list, stick there the uttermost limit, pay or no pay. I inaugurated the rule that as soon as an R. F. D. subscription expired, off the list it came. The result was, that instead of getting less than five per cent of renewals, the ratio rose to 80 within a ye and new R. F. D. subscriptions m than made up for those that were extended by the cold cash method.

We also kept the readers of the Ea in Blanksburg and surrounding tow paid up. They soon came to know t they could not have the paper for nothi —that its price was so much and wor it. And that, I think, is another reas why the number of Eagle readers h remained more than doubled months aft the canvass for circulation was end

Don't guess—find out from the peop themselves what kind of paper th want; give it to them wholehearted and with all kindliness; give to the when they want it; in turn, make the pay adequately and promptly for I ask you, is there an easier, mo commonsense, more satisfactory and le costly method of increasing a new paper's circulation and holding that ci culation indefinitely?

A BIG IMPLEMENT YEAR

SALES OF 55 MILLION DOLLARS EXPECTED IN KANSAS CITY AREA.

One Big Branch House Here Reports It Is Thousands of Tractors Behind Its Orders—Combines Also in Demand.

A major transition in the agriculture of America promises to give the implement industry of the Southwest the biggest year it ever has enjoyed. The era of power farming, brought about by economic conditions on the farms, is getting into full swing in the Kansas City territory. An estimate made by the chief of one of the leading branch implement houses placed the total volume of business expected this year in the seven states of the Kansas City market at 55 million dollars.

One big branch house reported it was behind on its orders and 1,000 tractors was now accepting orders subject only to prior sale. Another manager admitted confidentially he was "moving heaven and earth" with his factory to obtain 100 of the iron horses which had been sold in his territory. More than 50 per cent of the Kansas wheat crop, it was estimated by a third, would be handled entirely by power machinery this year, represented by the combined harvester thresher.

LAST YEAR BEST SINCE WAR.

"Last year was the best implement year enjoyed by Kansas City since the depression," said Ellis Chadwick, manager for the J. I. Case Threshing Machine Company, "and 1927 promises to be even better. We are sending out five to fifteen cars of harvester threshers daily and tractors are moving equally well."

The urgent demand for farm power machinery, M. J. Healey, vice-president of the John Deere Plow Company added, has resulted in his firm being practically sold out of the "combines" and tractors. He considered conditions made it safe to predict the best year for the Kansas City territory since 1920, the high point in implement purchases up to this time.

W. L. Simms, International Harvester Company manager, in agreeing that the implement business from a tonnage basis was decidedly better than last year, said he had found the farmer was not resisting the opportunity to purchase labor-saving tools even although he might believe the investment out of line with his present income.

LOAN AS AN INVESTMENT.

"It would be unfortunate, however," warned Mr. Healey, considered the dean of Kansas City implement men, "to conclude the farmer is rolling in wealth. He is able at the present time to buy the machinery he so urgently needs because his local banker has reached the conclusion a tractor is a good investment for a good farmer, and is willing to finance him."

The power development which is going on among the farms of America, reaching its highest point in the big holdings of this territory, will present an absorbing chapter for the future historian who sets down the progress of the present generation in this country. The farmer is following the lead of industry in mechanizing his farm as quickly as he is able. In this procedure he is being speeded by the same spur which competition set up in industry—cost of production.

Increased production per

"Best Year since 1920"

So says M. J. Healy, vice-president of the John Deere Plow Company, in forecasting implement sales in 1927. Similar comment was made by W. L. Simms, local manager of the International Harvester Company, and by Ellis Chadwick of the J. I. Case Threshing Machine Company.

Big Demand for Implements

It is estimated that the farmers in the 7-state area surrounding Kansas City will buy, this year, implements and tractors to the value of 55 million dollars.

Cheering as these facts are to all concerns doing business directly with farmers, they are equally important to general commodity manufacturers.

More than any other metropolitan city, Kansas City rests upon a foundation of agriculture. Wheat, corn and livestock are the principal sources of Kansas City's wealth. Kansas City is the greatest primary wheat market and the world's largest milling center.

Confidence Is Rural Keynote

The investment of 55 million dollars in farm implements in one year is a reflection of agricultural prosperity. It means that the farmer's credit is good. It means that he is confident. It means increased acreages, increased production, a stronger tone throughout the whole financial and industrial structure of the Southwest.

To Kansas City merchants it means increased patronage not alone from the out-of-town customer, but from the Kansas City trade as well. There will be more jobs in Kansas City, larger payrolls, increased factory output and a stimulation of wholesale and retail activity.

Both City and Country Benefit

Between city and rural residents there is occasion for mutual congratulation in this spontaneous program of expansion whose demands in agricultural implements alone will be 55 million dollars.

The Southwest is a rural market as well as an urban market. In fact, rural residents outnumber city dwellers 2 to 1.

How important, then, for advertisers to address both classes of population. To The Daily and Sunday Kansas City Star, which cover the suburban market, should be added The Weekly Kansas City Star to cover the equally important rural market.

Meet Opportunity Full Front

Such a combination is adequate advertising. It is meeting opportunity the full way. The Weekly Star, with more than half a million paid-in-advance circulation, is the largest farmer's weekly in the world.

Advertisers who use The Daily Star and Weekly Star or The Sunday Star and Weekly Star are allowed a special discount of 25% from the already low advertising rates for The Weekly Star.

THE NEW WO

Packs more production into a cubic foot of space, into a minute of time, and into a dollar of operating cost.

It comprises four new elements of a fundamental character.

The first, the Ultra-Modern Printing and Folding Unit, increases the pressroom's normal running speed more than sixty percent.

The second, the Automatic Paper Replenishing Device, cuts out all slow-downs or stoppages for paper replenishment, and thereby adds its quota of increased production to the sixty percent already mentioned. It also reduces spoils in like measure.

The third, the Two-Page Insert, enables a publisher, whatever the size of his paper, to step up or down the number of pages run by twos instead of by fours. This saves newsprint and lessens the work of every department.

D PRESSROOM

The fourth, the Automatic Production Controller, so accurately coordinates press and delivery rooms that neither more papers nor less are printed and delivered than the actual number desired.

This device automatically relieves both departments of the uncertainties and wastes inseparable from the wholly undependable rule-of-thumb system now in use. The delivery room knows at a glance what it has got and what is to come, while at the pressman's desk is at all times to be seen the condition of the run, and the amount contributed by every press.

These and other essential improvements not yet described may be seen daily in operation at our shops at Plainfield, New Jersey.

DIVORCE COURT CENSORSHIP

WE have seen few protests against the adoption of the English divorce court censorship by the state of Delaware. Some newspaper editorials contend it is quite all right to bar newspaper men from court-rooms where domestic tragedy is being recited. They even express hope that the idea will be adopted by other states. It surely will if there is no newspaper objection. The average lawyer would be glad to see reporters muzzled. Only judges that have a broad concept of the rights and duties of free press would object. Thoughtless legislators might think it very clever to act for the suppression of this class of news and, of course, all the professional moralists would warmly welcome this escape from face-to-face contact with the ugly facts of life as they are revealed in divorce actions, on the familiar theory that what is kept out of sight really does not exist. All smug people, sure that the newspapers, not society, must be reformed, would promptly fall in line. Deceitful husbands and sneaky wives would embrace with open arms the opportunity of shuttered divorce courts.

This proposition is, of course, wholly unconstitutional. It is un-American, unprincipled and dangerous to a degree. If press privilege is to be so easily tossed away in divorce courts there is no logical reason why news suppression should not be carried to other courts and finally to all courts. If public opinion is not the ruling factor in divorce causes, should it be in criminal or even in equity causes? If we have lost our appreciation of the public opinion standard in one matter, may we not easily lose it in other matters? If democracy does not work in the judicial branch, may it not be regarded as a failure in the executive or legislative branches? In its ultimate logic the new rule is: If there is anything in the democratic system that is unpleasant, just ignore the constitution and throw it out!

Divorce court censorship does not stand the test on any ground but mawkish prudery. If newspapers make indecent use of divorce court testimony they may be punished by laws that apply to the publication of lewd, salacious, indecent literature and be barred from the mails. Why create a censorship to prevent what existing law already prevents? It is said that divorce court censorship is a blessing because it protects the innocent relatives and friends of persons involved in scandalous relationships. But that is one of life's natural perils and as we go on broadening our culture we are less inclined to inflict vicarious blame on anyone. If relatives and friends of divorce litigants are to be protected, shall we not protect the families and friends of defendants in criminal actions?

Following the enactment of the censorship in England there was a large increase in the number of divorces. One of our esteemed contemporaries holds that this is a good thing, meaning that the beneficent new law gave relief to a large number of people who were unhappily mated but were too timid to face public opinion. Our own judgment is that no person with true cause for divorce has ever needed to fear public opinion, here or in England, but that a shuttered court is a safe refuge for men and women with evil designs upon each other. Under this censorship collusion, perjury and shyster lawyer plotting are sure to thrive.

It cannot be contended that certain newspapers have not abused divorce court news and EDITOR & PUBLISHER will be last to rise in their defense, or give comfort to any newspaper that publishes indecency. Indecent publication is, however, the exception rather than the rule. There have been some ugly examples of it in recent years, but not without ultimate punishment in some form for offenders. Every practical and conscientious newspaper man knows where the line between decency and indecency is drawn, and it is entirely possible for them to write news in the divorce courts which is just to persons written about, fair to their relatives and friends and a service to society.

Salute New York Times for landing the Lindbergh narrative and also for generously handing over to the gallant birdman the profits of syndication, and more money than mail carriers ever expect to see, let alone possess.

Remove far from me vanity and lies: give me neither poverty nor riches; feed me with food convenient for me.—Proverb, XXX; 8.

RETOUCHING CABLED PICTURES

THE cabled and radioed pictures of Lindbergh that we have seen in Eastern papers have been unsatisfactory and we wonder why it is that editors reproduce the copy as it comes from the transmitting process without any retouching. There is such a thing as legitimate retouching to make these pictures soundly printable. The crudities may be wiped out with a few strokes of the brush, and so long as the artist's work is true to the subject the charge of faking cannot be laid. When the picture is full of waves and crude lines, which, however, outline the image perfectly, retouching is a necessity. Size reductions will also serve to eliminate the crudities of large originals. Of course, there is the time element to be considered. We are sure that some of the poor pictures we have seen were received late and were pushed through without consideration of imperfections. But even a half-hour's brush-work by a good retoucher would have done much to make these pictures more accurately reflect their originals.

We (i.e., typewriter and self) have again sagaciously declared on the office bulletin board in favor of the two weeks that precede the first Monday in September.

"DESTRUCTIVE SILENCE"

EARNEST ELMO CALKINS coined two lines in his address at the Insurance Advertising Conference last week which will be remembered: "Advertising is business insurance; why do not the insurance companies advertise?" and "The men who insure the world against everything that can happen do not insure insurance against the destructive power of silence." Another telling line was that if insurance men would advertise they might sit in their offices like nose and throat specialists and people would crowd their offices for a chance to buy.

This is not only good oratory but the soundest sort of business sense. Every advertising man in this country knows that the great uncut melon is the insurance business. Insurance can reduce its selling cost and increase its sales in unimagined proportions by heeding the advice of advertising experts who, year after year, vainly point the way to an immense new source of profit.

But there is still a greater reason for the introduction of sensible insurance advertising methods. If more profit is made, the cost of insurance to the public may be lowered. Insurance is expensive, somewhat by reason of the antiquated commission sales methods in use. Advertising has reduced the cost of other commodities and can cut insurance rates. The people of this country are also entitled to the education that effective insurance copy would provide.

The boy seems to stand up well under the fierce glare, over there, and continues to yield the sweetest kind of copy.

NOW YOU ASK ONE

A LONDON journalist has written his confessions. His early motives in writing were: Ambition and escape from environment, 50 per cent; vanity, 25 per cent; earning a living, 20 per cent; something to say, 5 per cent. Now, with the passing of years, he has revised his motives, which he gives as follows: Earning a living, 50 per cent; vanity, 25 per cent; something to say, 25 per cent. It sounds reasonable, doesn't it?

CIRCUMLOCUTION

AN agency recently put a high-powered sch of advertising in a magazine of national ci tion for the manufacturer of a hou commodity. A large sum of money was appropr Naturally, the agency informed the manufacture he did not need to buy local newspaper circul (We are all familiar with the line of talk th the basis of such advertising negotiations). A days before the first magazine advertisement wa to appear the agency addressed urgent letters t advertising departments of local newspapers in cities advising that the goods were on sale at fied local stores and suggesting that the newsp get busy with local merchants and sell them to "tie up with the magazine campaign." The a also supplied copy for local merchants to sign. piece of copy incidentally urged the public to bu magazine which contained the manufacturer's nouncement, "for sale at all newsstands."

We submit that this is awkward business, in ways than one. In the first place, if the na magazine circulation cannot deliver local sal satisfy the advertiser, or meet the expectation agency, why has it been used to the exclusi local media? Why should a local newspaper g on an eleventh hour pursuit of local mercha induce them, at their expense, to rally to the su of a magazine campaign paid for by the ma turer? The relations that exist between newsp and local merchants very often do not perm such drives in behalf of some foreign agen producer. Isn't it downright impudence to ask papers to rush to the circulation support of a zine by soliciting advertisements to sell new copies that contain an advertisement? Perhaps facturers think they are making friends and porters among local merchants when they fra these little drives to force them to advertise brand wares, but we do not understand that chants appreciate the attention, either on the p manufacturers or newspapers that fall for their

Why all the circumlocution? The business in we take it, is not the publication of pretty pi in magazines, but something which will connect Bill Smith, of 198 First Street, Blankville, v piece of furniture for sale at Soandso's Big corner This Street and That Avenue. Mrs Smith surely reads the newspaper. It is as a part of her daily life as is washing dish winding the alarm clock. When she "sees it paper" she has learned something. Maybe she the magazine every week, or once in a while. she reads it after she has bought it. A pi furniture advertised in the magazine may cat eye, but if she is not told just where to go t that furniture the whole effect may be lost bewilderment. But if "the paper" says tha furniture is on sale at Soandso's Big Store a connection has absolutely been made. Why n direct, rather than indirect advertising, partic when it can be done with the same money? all the twisting and squirming to reach Mrs Smith's eye?

Write nothing for publication which you not understand.

GOOD LIBEL RULE

THE courts of the nation should follow th if they do not already do so, which was c by the Court of Appeals at Albany, N. Y week. The condition it corrects has long ha newspapers in defense of certain libel action

A New York woman brought suit against a paper for the publication of a news item whi ferred to the fact that a summons had been against her and reciting the alleged facts in the Before the complaint was filed the proposed su settled out of court. The woman sued for libel tending that the publication was untrue, that false to say that she had been sued when only moned and that the publication of news conc the issuance of a summons was not privileged

But the highest state court finds that "an act begun by the service of a summons, with or w complaint;" also that "A lawsuit, from beginn end, is in the nature of a judicial proceeding.

FOLKS WORTH KNOWING

SOME newspaper workers play golf, others play chess—anything to take their minds off the daily grind during their off hours.

GEORGE HAHN

For years George Hahn, editorial writer on the New Britain (Conn.) Herald, has rested the newspaper end of his mind when "off duty" by working the musical end of the cerebrum. He has "fussed with music" for so long—some 30 years — that he has become quite an expert, according to competent judges.

Recently three elaborate musical compositions written by Mr. Hahn were on a program of music by potent local composers in New Britain. These were a "Prelude" and a "Romance," for two pianos and "The Woods At Dusk," scored for violin, 'cello, flute and piano.

On June 7 radio station WTIC at Hartford, Conn., broadcast a suite of five numbers written by Mr. Hahn. The suite was entitled "To A Child," and the separate movements were entitled, "Merry Dawn Beams From the Sky," "The Baby's Kiss," "Frolic in the Garden," "Mama's Prayer," and "Kiddies' Parade." It was the first time that the station has broadcast an original suite for orchestra.

Quite a number of Mr. Hahn's compositions have been published in Boston, his "Army Frolic" being one of the popular marches. He is not a composer of tunes alone, but includes the harmony —frequently ultra-modernistic—and writes the scores complete.

CLASSIFIED ADVERTISING

Putting General Interest and Atmosphere Behind Classified Promotion —Kansas City Star Tells Prospects How to Write Copy—Handling Telephone Ad Takers

"CHERRY HILL" was the heading of an attractively laid out full page classified promotion advertisement in the New York Herald Tribune this week.

As every New Yorker knows, Cherry Hill is the name of one of the city's oldest and most picturesque sections.

"But," the question immediately arises, "what possible connection can Cherry Hill have with classified advertising, except vaguely, perhaps, with the real estate classification? What indeed?

The question was carried to the Herald Tribune. There the questioner was informed that all promotion copy for the paper is written by Miss Elsa Lang. Ask her, she knows. Miss Lang, however, doesn't talk for publication. She lets the copy she writes play interpreter to her ideas. And this is the interpretation:

There are two important methods of selling classified through promotion copy. First and foremost there is the testimonial with the daily reminder to readers to turn to the back pages and the classified section. Secondly there is copy that can be mainly entertaining and interesting without being wasteful. This second type of copy is most neglected by classified promotion writers. They ask, as EDITOR & PUBLISHER asked. "What connection is there between Cherry Hill and classified?"

The answer is that this type of copy puts general interest and atmosphere behind classified. It will be noticed in the Cherry Hill advertisement reproduced herewith that the text which swings smoothly through an entertaining description of the old section of New York turns very easily into a thought about classified.

Other picturesque sections of New York will be described in future similar classified promotion for the New York Herald Tribune.

Other copy written by Miss Lang has hinged about the theme of the "Classified Community," the homely human interest of classified. She has also written promotion copy tying up classified with books and reading in general. And just to be amusing, single column cartoons were used at one time, with humorous text telling the funny side about classified.

All this, it is explained, puts general interest and atmosphere into classified advertising, a function secondary, but not to be neglected for the daily reminder and selling testimonial copy.

To stimulate activity among his telephone advertisement takers, W. H. Hershey, classified advertising manager of the Cincinnati Enquirer, has adopted a rule that every one on his staff must obtain a minimum of $25 a day in advertisements in order to remain wi department.

Lively competition has resulted the rule. Several of the telephone sold as high as $300 a day and n took in less than $30. For the weeks the plan has been in ope the average of the department has between $35 and $40 a day.

"The advertisement takers are b ing expert saleswomen," Mr. H said. "In many instances they are ing the advertising order from on copy to three and seven consecuti sertions. They are also as customers to arrange the advertise in an intelligent manner, creating percentage of repeat orders and faction from patrons."

Suggestions on how to write help wanted ads are being offered Kansas City Star in boxes sca through its classified columns.

"Do not defeat a sale or the p of your ad with meaningless abb tions that readers do not under Good copy will bring response fro sirable applicants," the Star says.

"State positions to be filled; necessary experience and referenc quired; opportunity of advance salary; general attractiveness of po name of firm; when to apply; wh colored; other references."

The Star advises such careful pr tion of the ad before it is phoned ad taker.

Henry Eberle, for the past six at the classified counter of the Cin Enquirer, has been promoted to street solicitor for classified.

William G. DeRosset, classifie vertising manager of the Wo (Mass.) Post spoke before the Club of Worcester last week.

WITH THE GENERAL ADVERTISERS

American Oil Burner Association "Experimenting" with Local Dealer Campaign—New England to Spend $500,000—Publishers to Aid Maine Advertising Drive

AN experimental local dealer campaign is being run by the American Oil Burner Association in the newspapers of the home territory of one of the association's directors, J. D. Barnhill, executive of Lord and Thomas & Logan, advertising agency handling the account, informed EDITOR & PUBLISHER this week.

This is not to be confused with the campaign being conducted by the Oil Heating Institute, reported recently by EDITOR & PUBLISHER. The last named account, also handled by Lord and Thomas & Logan, was described by Mr. Barnhill as "a leadership campaign," conducted under a policy of paid space in the magazines and free space in the papers.

Larger manufacturers of oil burners are members of the Oil Heating Institute. They have agreed to contribute one per cent of their net factory earnings for advertising, and, under advice of Lord and Thomas & Logan are spending the sum raised exclusively in the magazines, according to Mr. Barnhill, who has informed EDITOR & PUBLISHER that the Institute is "a $500,000 account."

Leod D. Becker, is secretary of the American Oil Burner Association, New York, which is endeavoring to get its local dealer members to buy space in their home town papers. In this newspaper campaign, now "in the experimental stage," Lord and Thomas & Logan will simply provide the mats, Mr. Barnhill said. Mr. Barnhill declined to disclose in what city the experimental local dealer campaign was being placed. He also would not predict how many local dealer associations would buy space at local rates. He said the only one who knew how many local dealer associations there are was Mr. Becker, who had left New York this week to attend the sales convention of the Williams Oil-O-Matic Company to be held in Bloomington, Ill., June 6-7.

Railroads, hotels and state and community publicity bureaus in New England will spend $500,000 this year in advertising New England's recreational attractions throughout the entire United States and Canada, according to schedules recently sent to the New England Council.

New England advertisements will appear in newspapers as far west as Chicago and as far south as Washington, carrying the "Come to New England" message. Work by the New England Council is along the line of co-ordinating advertising effort in the interests of all New England.

Hugh Mitchell of New York, representing the H. K. McCann Advertising Company, has been in conference with the Maine Development Commission which, under present plans, will function July 16 in the expenditure of $100,000 in the next two years for advertising the State of Maine.

The commission will run a series of five or six quarter-page advertisements in newspapers of large cities such as New York, Boston, Cleveland and Detroit, calling attention to the industrial, agricultural and other advantages of Maine.

The Maine Daily Newspaper association has been asked by the commission to name a committee to aid the latter organization in advertising matters. The newspaper men named F. B. Nichols of the Bath Times and W. R. Reed of the Bangor News to serve on this committee. These appointments were made at the quarterly meeting of the association held in Augusta. Those present were Leigh D. and Charles F. Flynt of the Augusta Kennebec Journal, Fred. R. Lord and Roy Wardwell of the Portland Press-Herald and L. B. Costello of the Lewiston Sun-Journal.

Advertising, according to Miguel Suarez, chairman of the Cuban National Tourist Commission, greatly stimulated the influx of Americans into Cuba despite some of the adverse conditions created by the hurricane. More than 5,000 additional tourists visited Cuba during the past season.

Mr. Suarez is stopping for a few days at the Biltmore Hotel, New York. Magazines were used during the past year, but present plans call for an intensive newspaper campaign in the states east of the Mississippi River.

The Blanke Refined Health Coffee & Tea Corporation has been organized at St. Louis, with $450,000 capital stock, by C. F. Blanke, president of the C. F. Blanke Tea & Coffee Company, and his associates in the latter company. A national advertising campaign in magazines, newspapers and trade papers will be conducted through the advertising agency of Nelson Chesman & Co., St. Louis.

Davenport (Ia.) Times and Democrat Issue Joint National Rate Card

The Davenport (Ia.) Times and the Davenport Democrat have issued a joint rate card for national advertising. E. P. Adler is publisher of the Times and Frank D. Throop is publisher of the Democrat.

Commenting on the move Mr. Throop said:

"The joint rate card of the Times and Democrat does not indicate a reorganization or the admission of the Democrat to the Lee Syndicate, but simply means that the Davenport market will be sold on one rate card with advertising appearing in both Times and Democrat.

"The new rate of 14 cents is a total of the rates charged by the Times and Democrat of the past. We newspapers feel that a market so sold is an advantage to the advertiser and provides better coverage and better cooperation with less expense of administration by advertiser and agency."

Attention Mr. R. J. Baker

Gentlemen:

We are pleased to express our complete satisfaction of the 100-H.P. drive installed by you last September. We find it to be a great improvement over our old drive, and due to the absence of back lashing it should materially extend the life of our press. Where we formerly found it necessary to replace shearing pins weekly, we have not made a replacement since the operation of the new drive. The automatic control is another splendid feature, and Mr. Coonan, the foreman of our pressroom, has said that its pick-up from one speed to another is remarkably steady and eliminates all jolting of press gears.

I know there are other excellent features about the drive which I do not now recall, but I take pleasure in saying it has given complete satisfaction, and we are delighted with its dependable performance.

Very truly yours,

T. J. Wakeman

Treasurer.

Worcester (Mass.) Evening Post Brings 24 Carriers to New York —And Lancaster Intelligencer Comes, Too— Trenton Newsdealers Fined

Group of twenty Worcester (Mass.) Post carrier boys and four executives of the circulation department photographed at Grant's Tomb, New York, May 30. The boys won the trip to Manhattan in a recent contest for new readers. Standing in the rear now are (left to right): Martin J. Kelly, city district manager; Walter C. Beaudoin, county road manager; James T. Kelly, assistant circulation manager and I. Isenberg, county circulation manager. Standing at left, front row: F. W. Bope, promotion manager, Editor & Publisher.

AS a climax to a circulation contest among the carriers in Worcester and surrounding towns, the Worcester (Mass.) Evening Post brought the 24 winners to New York, May 28, on a three-day sightseeing trip.

The journey from Worcester to New London was made by bus, the rest of the trip by Sound steamer. In charge of the boys were James T. Kelly, assistant circulation manager; I. Isenberg, county circulation manager; Walter C. Beaudoin, county road man, and Martin J. Kelly, city district manager. The party made the Hotel McAlpin its headquarters, and were treated to the best of everything by the paper.

John H. J. Kuntz, circulation manager of the Lancaster (Pa.) Intelligencer and News Journal, and Fred L. Kendal, city carrier manager, also brought a group of 17 boys to New York last week to see the sights. The trip was awarded for generally good route work.

Three Trenton newsdealers have been fined $100 each by Vice-Chancellor Bentley for violation of an order of the court of chancery for interfering with the sale of New York newspapers in Trenton.

The court granted an injunction against the Trenton newsdealers restraining them from interfering with New York newspapers pending a dispute over the prices of the newspapers. "Mickey" Tracey, Tony Calu, and John Fuccello were the defendants fined.

The oratorical contest on the Constitution conducted by a group of important newspapers has come to a close for this year.

The contest was under the direction of the American Publishers' Committee, consisting of Frank B. Noyes, of the Washington Star, chairman; Adolph S. Ochs, of the New York Times; Walter A. Strong, of the Chicago Daily News; William L. McLean, Jr., of the Philadelphia Bulletin; Frederick I. Thompson, of the Mobile Register; Irwin Kirkwood, of the Kansas City Star, and Harry Chandler, of the Los Angeles Times.

Sam Frank, assistant circulation manager of the Bayonne (N. J.) Times, sailed May 28 with his mother for a two months' tour of Europe. Mr. Frank is only 20 years old. He owns three trucks used by the Times in serving various dealers of the city. Nine years ago he was a newsboy for the Times.

Sidney D. Long, business manager of the Wichita (Kan.) Eagle and Evening Eagle, this week reported that the new evening paper has had a "remarkable welcome" by the city. On May 21, the paper printed a publisher's sworn affidavit giving the total city circulation as 16,348.

Morning and Evening Eagles are being offered at a joint rate of 20 cents a week, including the Sunday edition.

George Young, Catalina swim winner, will appear in Richmond, Va., June 25, under the auspices of the Richmond News-Leader, to participate in the newspaper's seventh annual water meet.

George L. Adams, formerly with the circulation department, Seattle Times, has established at 406 Battery street a new business, termed the Adams News Company, which is handling national magazines on a wholesale basis.

L. M. Siler of NEA Service, Finds Lindbergh a Good Newspaper Man—Current Radio New Feature Offered by International—Post Syndicate Has Insurance Feature

KINGS and the world in general have praised Capt. Charles A. Lindbergh as a courageous airman and an all-round likable fellow. Now L. M. Siler, of NEA Service, Inc., has "discovered" him as a really good newspaper man.

Since the New York Times had bought the rights to the Captain's signed stories on the New York to Paris adventure, NEA also wanted by-line material. Mr. Siler, who is manager of the New York bureau of NEA, found what he wanted in the detailed reports Lindbergh had made to the air-mail service covering the hair-raising escapes from death he has had in airplane accidents.

"These reports were as though written by a highly trained newspaper reporter," Mr. Siler said. "No detail was lacking. The stories didn't have to be 'dressed up' at all."

The reports made by Lindbergh made two separate articles, which were distributed to clients by NEA.

Austin C. Lescarboura, formerly managing editor of the Scientific American, is writing "Current Radio," offered by International Syndicate, Baltimore, Md.

Frank J. Williams has written a series of 15 articles for the Post Syndicate, Inc., New York, on "The Rise of the Great Insurance Houses."

Zoe Beckley, writer for Famous Features Syndicate, Inc., New York, is touring the middle west to obtain interviews with prominent women leaders for her forthcoming series on "Speaking of Prohibition."

George C. Clark, an artist formerly on the staff of the Cleveland Press, has joined the art staff in the New York office of NEA Service, Inc. He succeeds L. W. Redner, resigned. NEA has created a new strip, based on the Book of Knowledge. Text is being handled by W. R. Braucher, while art is by P. V. Bessey.

John T. McCutcheon, cartoonist for the Chicago Tribune, and John C. Shaffer, publisher of the Chicago Evening Post, are among the Chicago Hoosiers who left June 4 to attend the third annual Indiana Literary Field Day at Culver Military Academy, Culver, Ind.

Among the first biographies of Capt. Charles A. Lindbergh are those written by George B. Fife for the New York World Syndicate, and by M. D. Tracy for the United Press.

THIRD DISTRICT ELECTS

Allen T. Pryor of Greensboro Heads Regional I. A. A. Clubs

Allen T. Pryor, of Greensboro, was elected chairman of the third district, International Advertising Association, at the final business session of the convention in Greensboro, Thursday, May 25. He succeeds B. Y. Kinzey, of Richmond, Va. Other officers elected were John Poole, of Washington, D. C., vice-chairman, and A. S. Myers, of Greensboro, secretary-treasurer.

The 1928 convention will be held in Greensboro next spring, this city being chosen unanimously for the second consecutive time. Reports of the various advertising clubs of the southeastern district, and discussion of the International Advertisers' Association convention, to be held at Denver, Col., at an early date, featured the closing session.

PAID PUBLICITY MEN STIFLE NEWS ALONG RIVIERA—OFFICIALS HOSTILE

Difficulties of Reporting Told by Correspondent—Favorable Propaganda Demanded—Writers Summoned by Police —Anglo-American Group Growing

By A RIVIERA CORRESPONDENT

THREE years ago the French Riviera knew nothing about Anglo-American newspaper men. English and American syndicates and individual newspapers were largely represented by French reporters attached to one or another of the local French papers. A growing increase in the number of important British and American visitors and year-around guests, together with a realization that much important news on the Riviera had formerly been stifled by the paid publicity agents of the various centres, such as Monte Carlo, led first to the idea of sending "special correspondents" from Paris and London, and finally resulted in keeping English-speaking reporters in the district—some for the winter season and some the year around.

This rapid increase in the number of Anglo-American newspapermen on the Riviera has developed a peculiar situation. The French directors of the various cities' Boosters Clubs, the various hotel organizations, and the wide-spread and powerful propaganda department of Monte Carlo (which includes two clever English-speaking writers, whose business it is to supply the world with the proper sort of news regarding the gambling centre of the world) expressed themselves as amazed at the fact that the papers of England and America had not been satisfied with the former service. The French journalists who had formerly held the jobs then went out of their way to point out that the news that the newcomers were sending from the Riviera was often of such a sensational character that it could not be printed in the district. Reports of suicides in Monte Carlo—always officially denied by every person except those who were on the spot—were cited.

Some months ago a disaster of a landslide at Roquebilliere, near Nice, was by mischance reported in a prominent London paper as having occurred in a suburb of Nice. The town is actually situated 20 miles from Nice. The English correspondent was called before the police, and even after he had shown carbon copies of his telegrams and proved that an agency report, sent by a local Frenchman, was responsible for the error in his paper, he was told, that a second offense would result in his expulsion from France. Further comedy was added when the City Fathers of Nice announced that they intended to sue the said paper for libel.

The climax came when the report of troop concentration on both sides of the Franco-Italian border was sent from Nice. With a dozen tanks in plain sight in the Gare de Riquier (Nice) the authorities attempted to deny that there was any movement of troops or munitions. The Garibaldi arrest operated in Nice was denied until the prisoner had arrived in Paris. Two weeks after the Fascist affair had died down foreign correspondents learned that all of their telegrams which looked at all suspicious had been sent to the Prefecture for censorship before they were sent.

Then the war-clouds disappeared, the Roquebilliere disaster was seemingly forgotten—but the tourists failed to appear in the numbers expected. The officials and the local press made a determined assault on the foreign journalists, attempting to blame them for having killed the season. One English reporter, who was especially charged, attempted to prove that it was the high cost of living, following the lowering of the exchange rate, that had ruined the season. He wired a story giving comparative prices for food and drink, covering this year and last, and was eventually informed by friends that certain committees on the Riviera considered him undesirable. "Were my figures true?" he asked. "Certainly, but those are not the news items that should be sent regarding the Riviera." The Syndicate d'Initiative of Nice now subscribes to English press-cutting services so as to keep track of what the foreigners send.

Following the campaign against the foreign newspapermen conducted by the local papers and the local booster committees it was decided to form a club of foreign correspondents including any and all who wrote for papers outside of France, or for papers in France published in other than the French language. From 40 to 50 members were recruited. The new organization came near to blowing up at its second luncheon when the President of the Syndicate d'Initiative de Nice so apparently insulted one of the members, a doyen of the Anglo-American press association of Paris, that the remainder of the speeches had to be discontinued. The English journalist had but asked for co-operation between the local booster groups and the foreign press. The reply was to the effect that if he wanted his news with his coffee and rolls in the morning, etc.

A group of foreign journalists on the coast will for a long time prove an impossibility because of the language question. The make-up at present roughly includes 3 Americans; 14 British; 3 Germans; 3 Australians; 6 Italians; and a number more than equal to the above of Spaniards, Czechs, Austrians, Hungarians, Danes, Swedes, Russians (God knows what papers they write for), a Chinaman, a man from Indo-China, an Egyptian, etc. A majority of these men make their living from the news items they send regarding the activities of the Riviera colonies of their nationals. But very few other than the English and American and agency men ever send wires.

The Riviera is experiencing a death battle between two newspaper factions centred in Nice and the struggle for French journalists to gain control of the "syndicate of foreign journalists" has caused most of the English and American reporters tentatively to withdraw from the group, since they are unwilling to be mixed up in what may turn out to be an old fashioned political battle in Nice, centering around the election of a new mayor and the creation of new laws regarding foreigners in the district. It has seemed impossible to keep the journalists' club free from the city's influence and now it is reported that an unofficial offer has been made to do all possible for the foreign reporters, provided a Frenchman, friend of the administration of the city, is elected president.

When called before some unofficial censors relative to a wire sent the night before, an impulsive Britisher produced the front page of one of the leading local papers and read the headlines, "Los Angeles and its suburb Miami ravaged by typhoon." His questioned wire was to the effect that the French Mediterranean squadron had arrived at Nice. It was admittedly true.

But compared to the Riviera, Monaco is a graveyard for news. One English correspondent, who is now officially and admittedly in the pay of the casino, is attempting to arrange a Monte Carlo syndicate service for 20 British papers. If he succeeds he will gain a monopoly on British news from the principality.

News, cables and feature stories on the Riviera are yet untouched. This is partly because Paris, London and New York, do not realize that it is a day's work to go from Nice to Cannes—Nice to Monte—Menton to Hyeres—and find some person. But one fifth of the villas have phones. The rule of aristocracy is living at least a mile from a tram line.

ALERT COAST GROUP SCANNED LEGISLATION

California Publishers Warded Off Censorship Attempt and Legal Rate Tinkering in Last Legislature

The California Newspaper Publishers' Association, headed by Harry S. Webster, business manager of the San Bernardino (Cal.) Sun and Telegram, in a campaign before the California legislature for protection of the newspaper interests, headed off attempts at censorship, saved the statutory safeguards for a legal newspaper and prevented the abolishing of legal publications that would have taken thousands of dollars in annual revenue from the newspapers.

The legislative session recently closed in California marked the first united effort of the newspapers of the State to be on the job at the State capitol as a business organization.

In co-operation with the California Press Association, Executive Secretary Ben H. Read of the California Newspaper Publishers' Association was stationed at the capitol for the greater part of the legislative session, establishing an office from which bulletins were issued to the newspapers of the State and closely watching all legislation that might affect newspapers.

"Two particularly obnoxious measures were killed off that would have been annoying to publishers had they become law," declared Mr. Read. "These were inaugurated by women's clubs in one portion of the State. One of them made it a misdemeanor to print the name of any person under the age of 16 years in a newspaper story of any crime. The other made it a misdemeanor to print the name of the victim of a statutory offense. The publishers' association opposed these measures on the ground that they were unnecessary and imposed an unwarranted censorship, because all newspapers respect the good names of women and children.

"A bill to wipe out all of the qualifications for a newspaper of general circulation, qualified to print legal notices, and thus permit any sort of a sheet to carry these notices, was personally headed off by President Webster, after it had reached the floor of the Assembly. An amendment was sponsored by the association to the law requiring a newspaper to do all of its mechanical work at the office of publication in order to qualify for printing legal notices. Under the amendment, which has been signed by the Governor, it will hereafter be necessary for a newspaper to do only 50 per cent of the composition and 50 per cent of the press work at the place of publication in order to qualify as a legal newspaper. Court decisions had made the former law so drastic that practically no newspaper in the State could meet its provisions."

Measures attempting to require newspapers to accept all city legal notices "at a reasonable rate," which publishers interpreted to mean any rate city trustees might determine as "reasonable" and to print county legal advertising at a rate no higher than the commercial display rate of the newspaper, were defeated.

A series of bills, which sought to abolish requirements for publication of notices in certain transactions involving estates and permit the notices to be only "posted," were amended to retain publication requirements.

"Newspapers gave support to the program of the Committee on Revision of the Criminal Code," continued Mr. Read, "which put teeth into California's anti-crime laws and also were favorable to a measure which permits any municipality to levy up to five cents on the $100 valuation for advertising purposes and a similar measure raising the amount counties can levy for advertising purposes from two cents on the $100 valuation to four cents."

Hearst film interests, is here shown photographed at Rome with Premier Mussolini at the conclusion of a conference which resulted in an arrangement between the Instituto Nazionale L. U. C. E. and the Hearst news-reel interests for the exchange of pictures.

The municipal advertising levy bill will have far-reaching effects, as it gives the smallest communities power to advertise themselves in outside mediums as well as in the local press. Even communities of as few as 1,000 inhabitants thus find themselves able to raise by taxation a $500 advertising fund. While towns of ten or fifteen thousand population will have enough money to advertise throughout their section of the State.

"Our investigation into legislation has aroused us to the vital necessity for newspapers to give more attention to what is going on in their State legislatures and at the national capital," Mr. Webster pointed out. "In this day of direct legislation it seems that 'to the alert goes protection.' Other lines of business have found it necessary to watch legislation and the California Newspaper Publishers' Association expects to make that one if its major activities."

J. S. METCALFE, DEAN OF STAGE CRITICS, DIES

Served 36 Years on Life, Later Joining Wall Street Journal—Once Editorial Writer and A. N. P. A. Manager

James Stetson Metcalfe, 68, dean of New York dramatic critics, and one time manager of the American Newspaper Publishers Association, died at his New York home on May 26. He had been living in retirement for some time. His last position was dramatic editor of the Wall Street Journal.

Mr. Metcalfe was born in Buffalo, June 27, 1858, the son of James Harvey Metcalfe, a banker, and Erzelia Frances Stetson. He was educated at Phillips Andover Academy and graduated from Yale in 1879, receiving the degree of Master of Arts in 1892.

From 1883 to 1884 Mr. Metcalfe was editor and publisher of The Modern Age, and he was an editorial writer on the Buffalo Express from 1884 to 1885. In 1886 he became editor of the People's Pictorial Press and was manager of the American Newspaper Publishers Association from 1886 to 1889.

For 31 years Mr. Metcalfe was dramatic editor of Life, in addition to being a stockholder in the publication. For several years he was also literary editor and art editor of Life, and once managing editor of the Cosmopolitan Magazine. He was associated with Judge in 1921, and in 1923 became dramatic editor of the Wall Street Journal.

Recently Mr. Metcalfe celebrated his fiftieth year as a dramatic critic at a banquet given by the informal supper club of critics—the First Nighters—of which he was president. Thus he was the undisputed dean of American critics. In 1915 the Metcalfe dramatic prize was established at Yale; in 1918 he received the Chevalier Legion of Honor.

As a dramatic critic, Mr. Metcalfe's life was more than unusually interesting. In 1905 he was barred from practically all the New York playhouses, 47 in number, and instituted suit against their owners. He charged them with a conspiracy to keep him out of the theatres because of his reviews of their productions. But a bill was later introduced at Albany which made it a misdemeanor to refuse to sell a theatre ticket and grant admission to persons applying therefor.

While at the height of her career, Bessie Tyree retired from the stage and was married to Mr. Metcalfe in 1904. At every first night the couple was conspicuous.

SAMUEL E. CARROLL

President and General Manager, Keokuk (Ia.) Gate City, Dies

Funeral services were held in the Christian Church, Keokuk, Ia., May 27, for Samuel Edgar Carroll, 65, president and general manager of the Keokuk Gate City and secretary-treasurer of the Iowa Daily Press Association. He had been prominent throughout his life in the Iowa newspaper field. The body was taken to Perry, his old home, for burial.

Mr. Carroll was born near Oquawka, Ill., April 1, 1862, and spent his boyhood in Washington, Ia. His first newspaper experience was in Greenfield, Ia., and later he became publisher of the Adel Record and retained ownership of that paper while serving as city editor of the old Des Moines Leader, then owned by the late Henry Stivers. In 1891 he moved to Perry and published the Perry Bulletin, moving in 1904 to Iowa City as publisher of the Iowa City Daily Press. He purchased the Republican and Weekly Democrat, merging the three papers as the Iowa City Press-Citizen. In 1922 he sold his interest in that paper and came to Keokuk, purchasing interests of Charles E. Warwick and becoming associated with P. R. Findlay in the Gate City. Two years ago he acquired the Findlay interests. Last year he was made president and general manager of the paper.

Surviving are his wife, two sons, Dale E. and Clarence C. and four brothers.

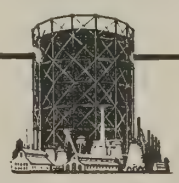
JOHN GOLOBIE



Pioneer Oklahoma Editor Dies—Completes Book in Hospital

John Golobie, pioneer Oklahoma editor who recently sold his interest in the Guthrie (Okla.) State Register, weekly, to his partner J. M. Dolph, died May 30, in Oklahoma City. He had recently finished his autography "A Citizen of Six Centuries" publication of which will be directed by Victor Murdock, editor of the Wichita (Kan.) Eagle. The manuscript was written in Mr. Golobie's hospital room.

Golobie wrote his life story in the shadow of death, his physicians advising him that in all probability he could not live to complete it.

The title is "A Citizen of Six Centuries" because of the author's belief that the people of the little Jugo-Slavian valley where he was born in the 1850's had not progressed in civilization to within 600 years of the land to which he came, an illiterate immigrant youth.

The immigrant lad became a power in Oklahoma press and politics, and his

WASHINGTON, Feb. 28.—Formal entry for the Orteig prize of $25,000 offered for the first non-stop transatlantic flight between New York and Paris was filed with the National Aeronautic Association here today by Charles A. Lindberch of St. Louis, Mo., who will pilot a Ryan monoplane.

This is the second formal entry for the flight, a previous one having been made by Lieut. Commander Noel Davis.

Lindbergh is an air mail pilot and flies between St. Louis and Chicago. Twice within the latter part of 1926 he narrowly escaped with his life and was forced to make parachute descents, abandoning his plane in a fog at night when the motor failed him.

The first accident occurred Sept. 16 while en route from Lambert, St. Louis Field, to Chicago, when the engine died in a fog at an altitude of about 5,000; the second occurred under similar circumstances on the same journey the night of Nov. 3 at an altitude of 13,000 feet.

In filing his entry today Lindbergh stated that he would use a Ryan monoplane equipped with Wright J-5 Whirlwind engines. The plane is understood to be under construction on the Pacific Coast.

The entry was accompanied with a certified check for $250, as required in accordance with the regulations for the contest. Lindbergh would now be able to make a start any time after April 25, as the regulations specify the entry must be filed sixty days prior to the start of the flight.

Commander Richard E. Byrd and Floyd Bennett are also understood to be planning to enter the contest for the Orteig Prize.

It is also understood that Captain Rene Fonck, the French ace, who made an unsuccessful attempt last Autumn, will make another attempt in the Spring, and that a new Sikorsky plane is being built for him and will be ready about May 1.

The above story was supplied exclusively to newspaper clients of the Capital City News Association, in its service of February 28.

COURT RULES LEGAL ACTIONS BEGUN BY SUMMONS ARE PRIVILEGED

New Decision Gives N. Y. State Newspapers Greater Latitude in News Coverage—Case Against N. Y. Post Remanded for New Trial

NEW YORK STATE newspapers are given greater license in the publication of facts concerning legal actions instituted by summons in a decision handed down May 31 by the Court of Appeals, Albany, reversing the decision of the Appellate Division, First Department, which reversed a judgment of the New York Supreme court of $8,000 in favor of Mrs. Annie McCoy Campbell, New York Christian Science practitioner, against the New York Evening Post.

The lower court had also dismissed the complaint, which is now reinstated and a new trial granted with costs to abide the result.

In writing the opinion of the court, Judge Cuthbert W. Pound, says: "An action is begun by the service of a summons, with or without a complaint. The summons is the mandate of the court and is subscribed, except where the party appears in person, by an attorney or an officer of the court. A law suit, from beginning to end, is in the nature of a judicial proceeding. The service of a summons begins the suit. A newspaper may publish of A that B has begun an action against him by the service of a summons. No reticence is demanded on that score. It may go further and state that the complaint has been filed in the county clerk's office. To stop there, and hold that the newspaper states the contents of the complaint at its peril, is to revive a rule of privacy in relation to litigants that no longer exists. To say that privilege protects the publication of the complaint when the summons is served by order of the court on a non-resident and does not protect the publication when the defendant is a resident is to state a distinction that has no basis in common sense. We are not bound to keep up such frivolous legal fictions.

"Judicial proceedings in New York include, in common parlance, all the proceedings in the action. We may as well disregard the overwhelming weight of authority elsewhere and start a rule of our own, consistent with practical experience."

Judge Pound discussed the argument that an action instituted by the service of a summons may not be further prosecuted and a complaint may never be served or filed and declared that a newspaper is not bound to await the outcome of any action before being permitted to publish a fair account of whatever facts may be learned from the papers served or filed.

The action of Mrs. Campbell was the first of five libel suits to reach the highest court and David Paine, counsel for the Post, argued the proposition of privilege in the face of many contrary decisions on the subject in other states, and his views are now unreservedly upheld by the court. The publication in the Post of March 30, 1922, was a rewrite of a story in the morning edition of the New York Times, written by Bruce Rae and gave the details of a fraud action instituted against Mrs. Campbell and Allen A. Canton by Mrs. Elizabeth S. Nichols, a wealthy patient of Mrs. Campbell. It was then begun by the service of a summons and later a complaint was served and filed in the county clerk's office, where they were seen by Mr. Rae, who also called on Mrs. Campbell and discussed the case with her. She testified at the trial that she requested that the story be not published, which was denied by the reporter. The complaint alleged that through the influence of Mrs. Campbell, Mrs. Nichols was induced to purchase $10,000 worth of stock in a corporation in which Canton was interested and to loan her $6,000. Mrs. Nichols never prosecuted the action and two years after its inception consented to a discontinuance when she discovered after a full investigation that Mrs. Campbell had not obtained the money and the charges of fraud could not be sustained.

Her counsel, W. Davis Conrad, argued that the pleadings on file in the county clerk's office did not constitute a judicial proceeding of which a fair account may be published. Mr. Paine contended the pleadings served and filed according to established legal procedure did constitute a judicial proceeding and were privileged, and made especially so when a party to the action had made a statement and commented on the contents of the pleading. The court, however, did not base its reasoning on this fact in holding the pleadings to be a judicial proceeding and privileged.

INJUNCTION SUIT DISMISSED

Syndicate Features Taken from Portland Telegram Remain with Journal

(By telegraph to EDITOR & PUBLISHER)

PORTLAND, Ore., June 1.—The court fight made by the Portland Telegram to prevent the Portland Oregon Journal from publishing certain comic-strip features used by the Telegram under contract with the Bell Syndicate, Inc.; of New York was dismissed today by Circuit Judge Bagley, who had been called here to decide whether or not the Telegram was to be granted an order to permanently restrain the Journal from using these features.

Judge Bagley held that the contracts between the Telegram and the Bell Syndicate were personal contracts and non-assignable, and for that reason if sold as part of the assets of the bankrupt estate of the Telegram the purchaser would get nothing.

Judge Bagley also held that under the facts the Journal had done nothing to induce the Bell Syndicate to breach its contract.

In his ruling the judge held that the contracts are still existing, but were withdrawn instead of being cancelled by the syndicate, the breach being made after the Telegram Publishing Company had been adjudged bankrupt. Should the Telegram hereafter continue its corporation it would have grounds for asking the Bell Syndicate to fulfill its contract, he ruled.

Judge Bagley held that the Bell Syndicate was not in court, as it had not been served with notice of the suit, and therefore injunction relief was not available against the syndicate.

f course, having come so early we did know what had happened on the d.

ome five or six thousand cars started. ut the same time a large part of crowd at Le Bourget decided to go e and read about it in the morning ers. About five or six thousand cars ted back to Paris.

o make a long story short, we got the traffic jam and stayed there two rs. Our profanity was no better, no se, than that of thousands of others. ughtless people laughed about it, but reporters suffered the tortures of the ned.

aturday night—the world's biggest y in hand, and New York 3,000 miles v. with us stuck in a traffic jam!

hilip had gone off over plowed fields a tree-climbing six-horse Citroen of his own. He went ten miles through trees and fields to another road, but Callender, Mac and I were stuck.

Then Mac got an idea.

"Let's go over to that bistro and telephone to Warren," he said.

Warren was the night man back in Paris. We cheered Mac—until we found the country phone was cut off at 11 o'clock, and then we cursed him.

Every twenty minutes we moved two feet and then we stopped and sweated and cursed.

"Say, James," asked Mac, "do you think we will get fired for this? If so, that makes it a tragedy."

"Thank the Lord I work for the Sunday department," said Callender, "and we can get it by then."

Then he offered to buy our story for Sunday two weeks hence.

It was heartrending.

And then it dawned on us that the other reporters were caught there, too. We walked up and down the line and found half a hundred, and later we discovered that we had made the evening's second hero out of a young reporter whom we taunted about his paper going to press within an hour. That boy, when our backs were turned, leaped out of his car and ran five miles to Port Villette, where he got a taxi. His story was one of the best written that night.

Moving along like snails we saw suddenly a little side road, more of a path than anything else. We took one look and turned.

We found ourselves in what seemed to be a cross between a plowed field and a sandpit. We were in the midst of excavations for a new city suburb.

We struggled on until we hit a hard field, on the other side of which glowed the lights of a village. There we arrived only with two broken springs and got on a fair road which led us back to the main Paris road. But in that struggle we had passed the traffic jam and at the corner found three policemen keeping things moving.

At 1:45 o'clock we reached our office, having taken three hours to do twelve miles. Philip had beaten us by ten minutes.

We started in getting the story together. Then we remembered we had not got Captain Lindbergh.

Where was he?

We knew where the reception committee intended to take him, but he was not there, as we found out by telephone. We called the chairman of the committee.

"Hell," he said, "I haven't laid eyes on him."

"Ambassador Herrick is a good fellow," some one said, "he will tell."

Off Mac went and found Captain Lindbergh sitting on the edge of a bed in the embassy drinking a glass of milk.

When Mac told him we had intended to isolate him, he answered:

"There seem to have been a million other people with the same idea."

Captain Lindbergh gave a brief sketch of his flight and invited us to see him after he had had some sleep.

Mac came back, all proud of himself. We all wrote until about 4 o'clock Sunday morning.

Next day we got a cable saying we had done good work and it all got there in time.

Next time Lindbergh does it, if France will mobilize her army to keep Le Bourget clear, we shall try to isolate Lindbergh.

THE furious fall campaign was at an end, the people of the state had registered their choice at the polls and one whom we shall call Big Tom was at home receiving the congratulations of his friends and neighbors. The citizens of the commonwealth had named him Governor. Flushed cheeks confessed his pride. Men and women lined the hall and dining room to shake his hand. Presently a torchlight procession, headed by a brass band, turned the corner of the street and halted before the door of the new hero.

"Speech," they cried, and he obliged. Midnight came and the crowd vanished. One man alone remained. The Governor-elect had asked him to wait. Big Tom approached this man glowing with gratitude. He grasped his hand and led him into the silent, darkened library.

"I am a proud and happy man tonight," said Big Tom, as he sank into a chair, "but I want to tell you, my good friend, that this day's victory belongs more to you and to your wonderful newspaper than to me or the party leaders. I realize that your support has been impersonal and that you are looking to me to deliver to the people and the state the service we have promised during this campaign. I pledge my best effort to you and I mean it. But I feel that for all you have done for me I should tell you that there is nothing within the gift of the office of the Governor of this state that you cannot have. I have asked you to remain tonight to have you tell me now, if you can, what I can do for you that will express in substantial terms my deep sense of gratitude." The newspaper man beamed and promptly admitted that he had one request to make, and one only. It was no sudden whim or new desire. Yes, there was something Big Tom might give in his official capacity that would not only square the personal account, but put the newspaper man in his debt for life. He hoped that it might be the first act of his new administration. This was said with an enthusiasm which seemed to surprise the Governor-elect.

"Tell me what it is," said he. The newspaper man looked at his watch. "It is nearly one o'clock, you are tired and my story is a long one," he said. "Shall I tell you some other time?" Big Tom hitched his chair close to that of his friend and replied, "No, tell me now, if it takes all night. You have me guessing."

THIS is the story the newspaper man told: Eighteen years ago on the 21st of June, at twilight, a young man and a girl were driving along a wooded road in a top buggy in San Tempo County, which as you know, is in the valley country in the southern section of our state. The girl, Sylvia Barnes, was the daughter of a prosperous farmer of that district and the young man, Joe Foster, had purchased a small adjoining farm only a few months before and lived alone in a tumble-down shack. The girl's father had early expressed a dislike for the new neighbor and he had warned the members of his family to turn cold shoulders toward him. However, one day, when the winter's snows had vanished from the fields and Joe Foster was pushing his team through a long furrow of his corn lot, near a gushing spring, he glanced up into the smiling eyes of Sylvia Barnes, sitting at her ease in the crotch of a rail-fence. From that meeting romance blossomed in the hearts of this young couple, but theirs necessarily must be a clandestine love. During the buggy ride on the evening of June 21, Sylvia had accepted the hand of the young farmer and an elopement plan had been made. The lovers were driving toward the Barnes farm when suddenly from a lane, old Barnes appeared astride his jenny mule. He saw—and fire of hate flashed into his eyes. In an instant he was on the ground. "Sylvia, go home," he commanded. Then he put out his long hickory-stout arms and grasped Joe Foster by the shoulders and dragged him to the road.

"You damned scoundrel," bellowed Barnes, "I'll teach you to keep on your own side of the fence." It was an unequal fight and when two boys from a neighboring farm chanced to pass along the road half an hour later Joe Foster's unconscious and bleeding body lay in the dust of the ditch. His horse had wandered off and Barnes and his daughter had disappeared. Foster finally got to his feet, dusted off his torn Sunday suit, shook his fist in the direction of the Barnes farm and shouted, "I'll kill that man for this."

ON the morning of June 22, Maxwell Barnes's body, riddled with buckshot, was found on the floor of his kitchen The murder tool was a sawed-off shotgun which had been exploded through a window as the old man sat in the darkness by the cook-stove. The murder was done at midnight, and the shot had startled the family, but so terrorized were Mrs. Barnes, her daughter and a farm-hand that it was hours before they summoned courage to give the alarm. Before seven o'clock, however, a deputy sheriff had arrived at the house and surveyed the scene. This keen-eyed official immediately noted the footprints outside the window through which the fatal shot had been fired. They were peculiar prints, showing both the stars and the crescent pegging of a new pair of lumberman's boots. A shattered piece of newspaper, that had served as a wad for the gun, lay on the floor, near the wall. The deputy traced the tell-tale boot-prints to the road and to the west for a half mile, turning then into the lane of Joe Foster's farm. He traced them to the barn and found the boots that fitted the prints hanging on a peg. Entering the shack he found a torn newspaper which corresponded with the gun-wadding. The farm boys who had heard Joe Foster's tragic threat gave their testimony. A warrant for Foster was issued and within a few hours the county was being scoured by fifty angry farmers. That night Foster was located in the woods, calmly cutting rails.

JOE FOSTER denied the charge. He said: "I did not kill Mr. Barnes, but I had sworn I would shoot him and I did intend to. In fact, last night around eleven o'clock I loaded my gun and walked up to his house and saw him sitting in the kitchen. I brought the gun up to my shoulder and then—well, I couldn't do it. I love Sylvia Barnes and I knew that if I fired that gun I would lose the woman I want as my wife. So I walked back to the shack and as I was excited, I thought best to hitch up my team and come out here in the woods and work off my temper cutting rails. You'll find my gun, just as I loaded it, hanging to a shelf over the door of my bedroom." The sheriff and his men received the story with contempt. It was weak stuff.

"Don't lie to us," said one, "we found your gun in the barn and it wasn't loaded. It had been fired and the paper you used to wad it was also found. The jig is up with you, young man, so some along," and Joe Foster took up his residence in the county jail.

THROUGHOUT his trial the young farmer stoutly maintained his innocence. His story did not vary a hair's breadth from that told when he was arrested. He could not explain how the gun had been exploded, and made no attempt to. So strong was the circumstantial evidence that the jury found him guilty, but owing to lack of corroborative testimony, specified his guilt in the second degree. He was sentenced to life imprisonment and is serving his tin we talk.

In a frenzy of dread I ran back to Foster's barn, threw down the gun and made off to find my rig in the woods. I was at home and in bed before two o'clock. In a few hours I heard that Barnes had been murdered and that Foster was accused. I stood the strain of his approaching trial for a few weeks and then could bear the suspense no longer and made a trip to California, hoping to ease my tortured thoughts. When I learned that the boy had been convicted I took to drink and for years I have wandered about the country, living a dissolute life and here I lie wrecked and dying. I have never had the courage to face my guilt, and it is too late now for me to do anything that would repair the harm I did to Joe Foster. Tomorrow my heart will stop and then you men can do what I have been too cowardly to do—bring that poor fellow out of the blackness of the penitentiary. I have nothing to leave him but my shame."

THE confession ended there and my companion and I consulted in low tones. I had never heard of the Barnes murder, but the old farmer knew perfectly what had happened and promptly confirmed the fact that the doctor had left the community shortly after Foster's arrest. Indeed, the farmer turned to me very calmly and said, "This story is not a big surprise to me. For years I have believed that Joe Foster was innocent. There has been a rumor in San Tempo County for a long time that the truth did not come out at the trial and probably never would. I believe every word of this story."

We returned to my office to talk over the question of whether we should remain silent, in these circumstances. I felt that I had encountered a cowardly fiend who should face exposure even if his death were imminent. My companion was inclined to agree with me. We thought of a number of questions we should ask him, and, pending a decision what our procedure should be, decided to return to the hospital. When we arrived a nurse informed us that the doctor had but a moment before expired.

THE newspaper man who related this story to the governor-elect then told how, for weeks, he had investigated every phase of the matter and had not only been able to check the accuracy of the facts but had actually obtained confirmation through two old men, themselves Morgan raiders, who knew that the doctor had drawn the tragic lot to kill Barnes, the betrayer. These men were among the most prosperous farmers in the community. The newspaper man drew from them the fact that both had been silent for the protection of the guilty doctor, but both pitied Foster. It was agreed that if they were protected and if Foster were pardoned they would "see to it that he gets along well if he comes back to San Tempo county and goes to farming again." The first act of Big Tom's administration was the pardoning of the lifer Joe Foster and the newspaper man who actually experienced this romance lived to see the convict's bitter sacrifice in part compensated.

OUR friend, the newspaper man, was a caller at this writer's office a week ago. He told the story on condition that it would be camouflaged in this re-telling. But the essential facts were as stated here and—have you guessed it? Joe and Sylvia now live in a new house built on a hill in San Tempo County and the children race happily over the new ploughed ground in June and sometimes sit in the crotch of the old rail fence, down by the spring. One of the marvels of the countryside is how Joe has prospered through the uniform kindliness of his neighbors, and the especial kindness of two rich old farmers who live nearby.

By JAMES MELVIN LEE

A BOOK that should have been mentioned before in this department is "Over My Left Shoulder" (D. Appleton & Co.) by Robert H. Davis. With the exception of the two contributions which open the volume, its contents consist of matter which the author has previously printed on the editorial page of the New York Sun under the standing head, "Bob Davis Recalls." The first two contributions, "Concerning the Most Dramatic Moment of My Life" and "All that I Know About the Art of Going to Sleep," originally apeared in Liberty.

Over his left shoulder Mr. Davis sees many interesting things in a panorama of men and matters of moment. Sometimes he sees cabbages, sometimes kings. But being a good reporter he always finds something interesting in what he sees. It makes no difference whether his shoulder view may be at actresses or cowboys prize fighters or prima donnas, artists or gold-diggers—the gold-diggers that are bred on prairie wilds, not the kind that prey in lobster palaces.

Typical of the stories found in this volume is the one in which Davis sought out the hiding place of O. Henry. The time was in 1903 when F. L. H. Noble had left the New York American to become Sunday Editor of the New York World. The assignment of Noble to Davis was:

"Go out and locate O. Henry. He has a breezy, brilliant and snappy style. I want him to write introductions to our Sunday stories. Offer $40 a week. If that fails to do the trick, jump to $50. The limit is $60."

Davis finally located O. Henry at the Hotel Marty. The latter, in shirt sleeves and with suspenders down, was seated beside a washstand "upon which reposed a huge bowl containing perhaps five pounds of cracked ice in which nestled a half dozen fine Bartlett pears."

"I am looking for Sydney Porter, otherwise O. Henry," said Davis.

"I am both," was the reply. "Here's a chair. Have some fruit. It is nice and cool. I suffer like hell in New York from the heat. What can I do for you?"

"I have a proposition to make. In fact, I have three propositions. But I shall make the last one first. The New York World authorizes me to offer you $60 a week to write introductions varying from 300 to 700 words in length, for special features appearing in the Sunday issue."

Davis had already taken two bites out of a Bartlett pear before he made the proposition. Then O. Henry remarked, "If this last proposition is the best, you needn't make the other two. I accept your proposition. Moreover, Mister, you can have the balance of the pears."

The connections of O. Henry with the World are thus outlined by Davis:

Noble subsequently retired from the editorship of the Sunday World and was succeeded by the late Colonel Caleb Van Hamm, who inquired, "Who is this man Porter?" I explained that he was one of Noble's selections, and that his rate was $60 a week for such introductions as were required for Sunday features.

Van Hamm uttered one brilliant, laconic sentence: "Can him."

I conveyed to O. Henry as gently as possible the information that his introductions were unsatisfactory. He seemed to be very much pleased. Subsequently he made a connection with the Evening World, in the columns of which appeared some of his best short fiction, among them "The Trimmed Lamp." These stories were gathered in the volume entitled "The Four Million."

At the expiration of that agreement I came to the editorship of the Frank A. Munsey publications and made a seven-year contract for first reading of O. Henry's entire output.

A companion chapter to the one that carries the O. Henry head is XLI, "On Shaking Hands Incognito with Joseph Pulitzer." Something that Davis had helped to write pleased Pulitzer who wanted to see its author. Details are given in the chapter, but this comment by Pulitzer is worth quoting as an expression of his views on how news should be covered:

"I want the men who gather the news and who edit it to exhaust each story as quickly as possible, and then proceed to the next one. Accentuated common sense is all that is needed to get out a good newspaper. This story is complete in every detail. Thank God, it won't require telling again."

An introduction is contributed by Irvin S. Cobb who speaks of Davis as a great reporter, a great editor, and author of authors. He then expresses a wish that the reader will like this book by Bob Davis, but admits that he is "prejudiced in favor of the defendant." All of us are.

OSCAR HAMMERSTEIN'S fight with the old New York Press is retold in Liberty for May 28. Mary Garden had disappeared and did not show up at Hammerstein's theatre for ten days. Then she came back and sang as if nothing had happened. New York newspapers, except the Press, thought the disappearance merely a publicity stunt. The article in Liberty presents the facts which were that Mary Garden, "miffed" because Hammerstein had engaged Lina Cavalieri to sing in "Thais," decided to quit. Cavalieri sang "Thais" just once, then Mary came back. Hammerstein never denied the story that the disappearance was merely a bit of press-agency.

But the New York Press continued to hector Hammerstein first about this and then about that. It sent reporters to every performance only to find fault. Finally Hammerstein, though he seldom wrote letters and never had a stenographer, did pen a picric note to the Press in which he used, "Please, in the future, do keep your two reporters out of my theatre. It is necessary to disinfect it every performance only to find fault.

George Blumenthal, who is running a series about Hammerstein in Liberty thus sums up the result of the note:

The Press didn't like that. Neither did the reporters. The latter caught Mr. Hammerstein, famous silk hat and all, on Broadway one day. They trod on his hat and punched him several times on his cherublike cheeks. Mr. Hammerstein sued the Press for libelous articles—and won. It was not long after that the paper ceased printing. Munsey bought it and junked it.

HAROLD DE WOLF FULLER, formerly editor of The Nation and now editor of New York, indicts in the current issue of his journal American newspapers for having two standards: one on their editorial page, and an entirely different one for front page news. He expresses his inability to understand why newspaper publishers do not practice on their news pages what they preach on their editorial departments.

The explanation is simple. The editorial page prints what the editor thinks the people ought to have, while the other pages are frankly marketed to the reading public as containing the news, be it good or bad. A newspaper may have regrets from an editorial point of view, but it simply must print news of murders, robberies, and other crimes.

The late Charles William Eliot of Harvard University has paid a fine tribute to the full publicity that is given to crime in American newspapers and does not hesitate to say that such publicity constitutes one of the greatest safeguards of American democracy.

The New York Public Library has just published the report of its Director. The section headed "Newspaper Division" opens as follows:

Murder held first place in the interests of readers of bound files of newspapers. Short story writers appreciated the interest of the public in murder, and many came to consult current reports as set forth in the newspapers, before they set themselves down to the task of reworking these accounts into the form of fiction.

The newspaper editor may regret that a sensational murder has occurred in his community. But the paper must print the news about it. College professors, church bishops, as well as the man on the street, are interested in murder cases and want details. The quotation from the report of the director of the New York Public Library is rather a positive proof of the deep interest of the reading public in stories that involve murder. Of cour there are reasonable limits beyond whi no respectable newspaper ever goes. Po sibly some reporters have gone too f down the line. But at that, they ha not gone as far as some clergymen wh have become temporary reporters.

So long as the public is admitted court rooms where details of a murd may be heard, there is no valid reas why those who can't get inside the cou house should not have an opportunity get details in the columns of their new papers. Criticism of accounts of murde printed in American newspapers mig have much better been directed at t lawyers who conducted the cases inste of at the reporters who merely told wh took place. Fortunately, the bar in so states is paying attention to this matte

We are not excusing newspapers that follow along sensational lines but we must bear in mind that crime, which is the foundation of many of the sensational reports published in newspapers, did not originate in the editorial rooms of a newspaper. We are no more responsible for crime than we were for the World War.

I have always contended that treating these subjects judiciously in the news columns and then editorializing will do more to remedy conditions than any censorship plan that can be devised.

I want you to know how I feel about your editorial and how logical your argument is from the viewpoint of the average editor.

LIBEL STATEMENT QUOTED

To EDITOR & PUBLISHER: In the May 14 issue of EDITOR & PUBLISHER, you have the story of a libel suit against the Sioux City Tribune, and I want to take exception to the first line in the second paragraph, in which EDITOR & PUBLISHER says "the suit is based on a statement in The Tribune a year ago in which the paper said that," etc.

I am enclosing a statement of our story announcing the libel suit and want to call your attention particularly to the fact that it was a quotation of the Mayor of Sioux City in council meeting, and was merely reprinted in The Tribune as his statement, not as ours.

CARTOONS IN ADVERTISING

To EDITOR & PUBLISHER: An editor whose moral consciousness has not become smeared with the scum of commercialism asks this question:

"What do you think of Briggs drawing cartoons in exact feature style and character for ads? It seems a bit unfair. A paper paying for the service is in the peculiar position of seeing the cartoons in a rival paper which is paid for printing the cartoons."

I am glad that the editor pushed this question into the limelight. It gives opportunity for discussion of a subject that is of vital concern to every newspaper. As I see it, the very reputations of newspapers are at stake.

Answering for myself the question propounded by the editor, I think that Briggs has cheapened his famous cartoon in the eyes of the public, impaired if not destroyed its value as a news feature, and at the same time sold out for a consideration those who bought and paid for what they had a right to consider an exclusive news service.

As a protest against the policy of syndicating cartoons as a news feature and at the same time using the same cartoon, title and characters to propagate cigarette advertising, I cancelled a contract for another cartoon. The cancellation was made not because the cartoonist had offended, but on the theory that if one cartoonist could sell out his constituency and get away with it, there was reason to believe that others may do the same thing, inasmuch as the commercial practice seems to be done with the knowledge, and thereby the tacit consent, of the syndicate company controlling the cartoons.

I question the legal right of selling a cartoon as an exclusive newspaper feature and then selling the same cartoon, with only a change of the dialogue text, to fit an advertising scheme that may be published by any paper selected by the advertiser. The point is that advertisers have by the practice capitalized without cost to themselves the cartoon characters that have been created for newspapers and made valuable and popular by newspaper publication generally as a news feature. The characters or the title are copyrighted for use as such. To use the characters or titles in any other way is, in my opinion, a violation of contract. But more than this, it is a violation of the standard of ethics and the principles of fair play.

It must be remembered that the newspapers make the cartoonist. The cartoonist does not make the newspaper. Were it not for the advertising and publicity given cartoonists by newspapers and the wide distribution by syndicating through newspapers, cartoonists now nationally known would be practically unknown outside of very narrow limitations.

The plea is made by syndicate houses that they can not control cartoonists; that they reserve certain privileges for free lance work outside. If that be true, then the cartoonists, or those whose greed for money is so great that it stunts their normal conscience and ethical obligations to the newspapers and to the reading public, are due for a fall from the pinnacle of fame on which they are mounted.

Reader confidence, it is a truism, is the basis of all newspaper success and the tolerance of any practice that might destroy or impair it is suicidal. Upon the newspapers themselves rests the final responsibility.

SNYDER-GRAY CASE

To EDITOR & PUBLISHER: There is no very good reason why I should write this, but I cannot, it seems, overlook such a luxury as writing something for the papers.

Like Art Mefford of the News, I withstood the entire Hall-Mills war, and my record there was even worse than his. Because I worked on it in 1922, too, from the first day to the last. And, like Art, I insist that was the world's best murder story, and it is going to be hard to beat it. Like Art, I insist, too, that the element of mystery was decidedly lost in this Snyder-Gray thing which has just drifted off over the horizon. But unlike Art—and Art being a good reporter, has a lot of foundation for what he says—I can't insist that the Snyder-Gray murder was as badly manhandled as he says it was.

In one thing, I agree. There was a lot of foolish guff handed out on it. But the fact remains that there wasn't any faking to speak of. Art O'Sullivan and Irene Kuhn put over the only real exclusive story from first to last for The Mirror—and the trial proved them right in every detail.

Certainly a lot of rumors were printed. That had to happen, just as it happened in Somerville and New Brunswick. Certainly a lot of things appeared in the newspapers that couldn't be entirely verified. But that happened on the Hall-Mills story, too. The Snyder-Gray story, as a murder story, was no different than any other, except in one detail. And it is just possible that that detail has been overlooked in your article on what made it a "selling story."

Most of the reporters who handled it agree that the one big outstanding thing in the Snyder-Gray story and trial was the cruel, viscious brutality of the story Henry Judd Gray told in his confession, and again on the witness stand. People read the story of that trial in horror and amazement, just as the reporters listened to it. I've fooled around on most of New York's recent big murders, and I've read a lot about out of town killings. But for savage, brutal visciousness, none of them ever approached the Snyder-Gray story—and there was, in addition, the cold, calculating way it was planned. To my mind, the story wasn't so badly bungled as Art Mefford says it was, and because it was a story that told the real cruelty of humanity, it was a story which humanity read. Every one of 'em shuddered and kept right on reading. And that, as they say, is that.

WILBUR E. ROGERS.

VON BLON WAS M. E.

To EDITOR & PUBLISHER: In my History of the Stars and Stripes which appeared in EDITOR & PUBLISHER April 23 and 30, an important detail was omitted. Philip Von Blon who was mentioned as a leading member of the editorial council actually became managing editor upon the resignation of Harold W. Ross in March 1919. There were several withdrawals from the staff at that time incident to demobilization, and Von Blon and Major Watson were under a rather severe handicap in keeping the paper going with a reorganized staff. Hawley and Wallgreen remained with the weekly to the end which helped greatly, as did the obtaining of Herbert Stoops to do a series of cartoons.

NEW TYPE HYDRAULIC PRESS

Scott Product Tested in Plant of New York Herald Tribune

A new type of hydraulic press for mat making, manufactured by the Scott Printing Press Company, is being tried out by the New York Herald Tribune. Arthur H. Burns, mechanical superintendent, described it for EDITOR & PUBLISHER this week as a machine with several "worth while additions."

"It has a steam head like an ordinary steam table," he said. "The upper platen, however, above the form is hollow and has a vacuum connection that sucks the steam out through the blankets quickly.

"It will make a dry mat in about one minute, and a wet mat and dry it in three minutes, or half the time used by an ordinary steam table.

OCCUPY NEW HOME

Pensacola News and Journal Now Printing from Remodelled Plant

The Pensacola News and Journal, John H. Perry, president, recently moved into their remodelled 3-story plant, which formerly was the Army and Navy Club building. The papers now have 15,000 square feet of floor space and improvements in all departments.

Business, advertising and circulation offices are on the main floor, with the press room, housing a new Goss sextuple, in the rear. Editorial rooms are on the second floor, and also a large paper storage room capable of housing 50 tons of newsprint. On the third floor is the composing room and a large auditorium with a seating capacity of 300. The auditorium has been placed at the disposal of local organizations as a meeting place.

The papers printed a special Housewarming Number May 18, to celebrate occupancy of the new quarters.

PRAISES U. S. SYNDICATES

Visiting Japanese Newspaper Man Here Studying Journalism

Praise for the syndicate system as it operates in this country was given this week by Yoshihide Hara, editor of the Fukuoka Nichinichi Shimbun, in an interview in New York. Mr. Hara is one of five Japanese newspaper men on a world tour to study newspaper methods of different countries.

"The syndicate system which exists in this country," said Mr. Hara, speaking through an interpreter, "is a wonderful contribution to the newspaper field in the distribution of cartoons and feature stories. This system does not exist in Japan." Mr. Hara said he was surprised at the large amount of paper one gets for the money in this country, especially on Sunday.

Mr. Hara has attended classes of journalism at the University of Missouri and University of Wisconsin and has visited newspapers in most of the large cities of the United States. He sailed Tuesday on the Aquitania for a tour of France, Germany and Russia before returning to Japan.

EIGHTY YEARS

Eighty years of effort.

A goodly lifetime of city buildings; of adventures, experiments, repetitions, mistakes: but large visions always, and never surrender.

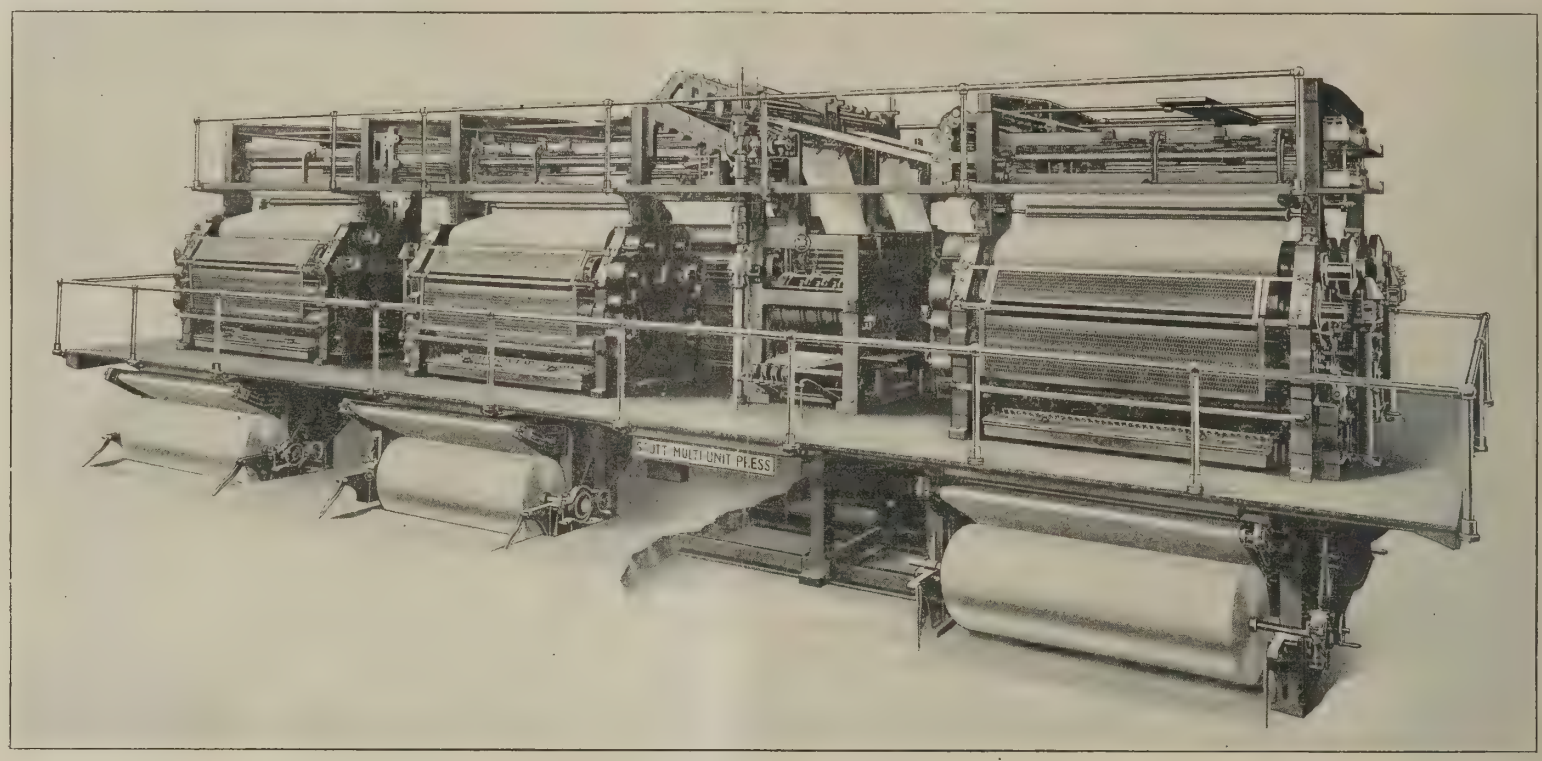
Such Chicago and its Tribune from 1847 to 1927—the period of The Tribune's existence to this June.

Nearly two and a half generations of Chicagoans have been doing their work in those eight decades—building up, tearing down, building up again, and yet again; bending to storms, rechanneling continental watersheds, quelling riots, receiving royal visitors, holding conventions that shaped the history of the republic, peering with smoke bleared eyes through a conflagration that made new history in catastrophes and—here the true importance of the event—new history in recoveries.

From a raw midwest boom town reached only by stagecoaches and steamboats in 1847 to your world capital that is the terminus of twenty-seven railroads; from seven bankers and brokers with almost no institutional standing to 214 banks with deposits of nearly two and three-quarter billions; from wooden taverns, mostly on or near sodden river banks, to a glittering avenue of hotels into some of which could be crowded the equivalent of Chicago's population of eighty years ago; from a lake front with tracks strung on piles and carrying wood burning locomotives to electrified trains gliding silently beneath the walls of the largest art school in the world and past the marble porticos of "far-eyed Science"; from a city that disaster left bookless fifty-six years ago to ten premier libraries containing more than four million books and pamphlets; from a meager, anxious four page Tribune that circulated 400 copies on the morning of June 10, 1847, to a Tribune that finished printing this morning nearly 1,200,000 copies of this issue.

They have come to pass within the memory of men still living. They have meant work. Builders of a world city have never worked harder. They have known defeats, but no lulls.

The population whose civic affairs twenty-eight mayors have administered since 1847 has grown from 16,859 to 3,074,864.



Looking afar, peering, listening; always listening. And hearing while they wrought and while they listened the echo of a sound a poet heard. Now faint, childlike, tentative, now resolute, exultant, overbearing, full of bravado and full of fact, that echo makes musical our eight decades and becomes a city's song:

"Far off I hear the crowing of the cocks,
And through the opening door that Time unlocks
Feel the fresh breathing of Tomorrow creep.'

Growth of Advertising in the New York Herald Tribune

{since the consolidation of the Tribune and the Herald}

ADVERTISING GROWTH is the surest indication of advertising value. Herald Tribune advertising is growing faster than that of any other New York newspaper and faster than that of any other American newspaper of similar size.

In comparison with 133 newspapers of the largest cities in America, the Herald Tribune had the third largest advertising gain in 1926,—much larger than that of any other newspaper of similar size. The following are the first 30 papers in amount of gain, 1926 over 1925:—

Newspaper Wars For National Business Wane As Mergers Kill Old Rivalries

Agreements Between Separately Owned Competitors to Sell Their Field As a Unit Also a Response to Space-Buyers' Repeated Demands for Truth and Dignity

By ARTHUR ROBB

COMMENT upon newspaper consolidations in recent years has paid little attention to an "end result" which is likely to have far-reaching effects upon the purchase and sale of newspaper advertising space—the elimination of the vigorous and sometimes vicious competition between two newspapers of a city for the national advertiser's business.

In practically every city outside of New York and Philadelphia where morning and evening newspapers are operated under one ownership and from one plant, space is sold to the national advertiser at a single rate, and while use of both editions is not always compulsory, there is usually in such cases a clause providing that one or the other of the two editions is sold only in combination.

Another phase of this tendency is the elimination of the Sunday edition as a separate factor in the rate structure in many cities. An attractive rate is quoted for a double insertion, either in the morning and the Sunday editions or in the evening and the Sunday editions, the latter being the usual combination.

More recently this co-operative idea has received a new turn—exemplified best in the announcement last week that the Davenport (Ia.) Times, a newspaper owned by the Lee Syndicate, and its evening competitor, the Davenport Democrat, would in future sell their space to the national advertiser on one rate card. No change will be made in any other relations of these independently owned and operated newspapers. The new rate is the sum of the charges formerly quoted on their individual rate cards.

A similar arrangement exists in one or two smaller cities, where separately-owned newspapers have learned to sink their natural competitive differences to the extent of presenting a united front and unanimous smiles in the direction of the national advertiser.

Co-operation of any kind in any branch of the newspaper business is rare enough to arouse comment when it is tried and found successful. Editorial departments in the largest cities have for many years found it advantageous to pool resources in the covering of routine news sources. Circulation departments in a few of the smaller cities have found co-operative delivery of morning papers feasible, and in Ottawa, Ont., the Journal and the Citizen, in morning and evening operations, have for several years conducted their distribution as a unit, both papers, though separately owned and operated in all other respects, having one circulation manager. Both papers compete as hard as any others for the interest and patronage of Ottawa readers, both by their editorial content and by many of the legitimate and conservative methods of obtaining new readers.

Co-operative measures in the national advertising field, however, have been slow to develop. Many publishers have felt that any great measure of co-operation in what is a vital phase of their operations must be the first step toward deadening the spirit of rivalry which has been a powerful motive force in the development of newspapers from the earliest days.

The old-time fierce battles of the pen between the editors are seldom seen now, but the rivalries they engendered between the institution and that "other fellow" up or down the street have become even more toxic as weapons in the hands of the advertising manager and his staff and the representatives in the national advertising field. In no department of salesmanship is the combat more bitter than between the representatives of competing newspapers for a share in the limited appropriation allotted to their city.

ARE THEY "WOLVES"?

AN advertising agency president, with years of experience both in the sale and the purchase of newspaper advertising, last week referred to the salesmen of newspaper space as "wolves," who would tear down his carefully constructed campaign in selfish efforts to obtain a share of it for their papers.

That the past gives much to support the truth of the charge is undeniable, but the present shows a distinct revulsion among newspaper men against the old methods.

Market analysis, as applied to newspaper advertising, is less than a decade old. It is now a staple element in every capable newspaper salesman's equipment. Circulation statements, in general, tell a story that is easily understood and hard to offset by the old "knocking" methods.

Competition in many local markets, as the article on this page points out, has been eased by consolidation.

The day of the "newspaper wolf" is about done and his successors can with justice resent application of the epithet to themselves or their labors.

This kind of competition has been expensive, even though it has helped to produce the tremendous linage that the newspapers have enjoyed for the past seven years. It has brought repeated pleas from space-buyers to be relieved of the burden of shaking the one grain of truth which they suspected might lurk in the conflicting claims for preference put forth by competing newspapers. It has brought the statement from a number of space-buyers that the truth is not in newspapers when they are talking about themselves as advertising media. It has placed the emphasis in many newspaper sales arguments upon the paper itself, in which the space-buyer is often not primarily interested, and not upon the market and its opportunities for sales of his product, in which the advertiser's principal interest lies. There have been many and notable exceptions, to be sure, and some of the best salesmanship demonstrated by space solicitors belongs in the newspaper ranks.

To a great extent the consolidation of newspapers in many cities has ended this bane of the agency's life, only to give rise to another which has brought howls of anguish from the national advertiser himself.

Statements have been made before meetings of the Association of National Advertisers to the effect that the compulsory combination purchase of space has retained to the publisher all of the benefits due to the merger under one operation of two former competitors, without sharing the gains with the advertiser. It has been asserted that rates have been increased under the combination arrangement until they are often higher than the sum of the rates formerly charged by the individual newspaper and that the advertiser is forced to buy a large amount of circulation that he cannot use and does not want in order that the publisher may make his new investment pay.

There is no doubt that the latter is an extreme statement, applicable to only a small minority of the many consolidations that have been effected in recent years. The more usual result of the merger has been a decrease in the combination rate amounting sometimes to as much as 30 per cent from the sum of the old schedules. In several cases, the proprietor of the newspapers has made the consolidation an occasion for the drafting of an entirely new rate card. Haphazard systems of charging all that the traffic would bear, even when the traffic apparently would not bear enough to pay the publisher a savings bank return on his investment, have been dropped in favor of a rate based upon the cost of operation and providing for increases or decreases in rate according as circulation averages went up or down. If the resulting rate-card bears higher tariffs than the former schedules, the publisher is confident that his product is worth what he charges and that the advertiser has no legal or ethical right to expect him to sell a high-grade service for less than the cost of production plus a reasonable profit.

Compulsory combination rates have often been necessary following the merger of a weak paper with a strong competitor in the opposite field. Advertisers have withheld their patronage from the weaker paper in the past and the force of habit is as strong in space-buying as in other human activities. It has been extremely difficult for publishers to convince advertisers that the weak paper's past is its past and that its history has nothing to do with its present operation. In the absence of a compulsory provision on the rate card, a number of well-managed newspapers are today being visited with the sins and errors of their former owners, while the other member of their combination-group grows more and more prosperous.

A spirit of co-operation and willingness to understand the other side of the problem is as necessary to the advertiser as it is to the publisher if conditions like that described are to be corrected. If advertisers appear to want for themselves all of the gains that the publisher has accomplished for himself and his community through the investment necessary to buy out competition, the publisher cannot be lectured for adopting such regulations as he finds necessary to guard his welfare. That the publisher is not so much a creature of custom, habit, and prejudice as is the buyer of his space is evidenced by the occasional announcements of several morning-evening combinations in recent months that their space could be purchased on an optional as well as a compulsory combination basis. As noted above, the publisher has maintained a measure of protection as a rule by providing that the advertiser cannot use the supposedly stronger unit of the combination without buying space in the newer and presumably weaker member. He can buy space in the latter unit usually at a much lower rate than might be quoted if the paper were an enterprise, well aged and established under its present management. This is a comparatively new idea in most newspaper plants and its results will be watched from both sides of the space-buying fence with concern during the next year or two. It is worthy of an unprejudiced trial.

The tie-up in the sale of Sunday space with an insertion in a morning or evening issue under a combination rate has been in operation in a score of cities for periods ranging from one to five years. Records available in this office do not indicate that any newspaper which placed such a clause on its rate card has ever removed it and a number of new cards containing such notations have been issued in the past few months. Varying reasons exist for the provision. In some operations the Sunday edition is used by some advertisers exclusively, even though the publisher believes that some of their space should appear in the daily issues. Other advertisers use the daily issues to the exclusion of the Sunday, with the result that the latter edition operated in connection with strong six-day evening papers frequently shows an operating balance in red. To bring about the desired evenness of operation both on the week-day and Sunday sheets, the new card has been effective by compelling the Sunday-only advertiser to take space in a week-day issue (often a slim Saturday or Monday edition) and inducing the other class to take advantage of the low rate offered for combination and Sunday insertion.

CANTON'S FORMER CHIEF OF POLICE TO STAND TRIAL FOR MELLETT MURDER

S. A. Lengel Is First of "Higher-Ups" Indicted in Editor's Death—Was Deposed for Failure to Prosecute Search for Murderers—Council Praises Daily News

SERANUS A. LENGEL, former Canton Chief of Police, will go on trial July 11 on the charge of first degree murder in the conspiracy which brought about the assassination of Don R. Mellett, editor of the Canton (O.) Daily News, July 16, 1926.

Lengel is the fifth man indicted. Patrick E. McDermott, Ben Rudner and Louis Mazer, together with former Police Detective Floyd Streitenberger, are now in the Ohio penitentiary, all with life sentences except Mazer who turned State's evidence after McDermott and Rudner had been convicted. His testimony convicted Streitenberger and the court permitted him to plead guilty to manslaughter which carries a sentence of from five to twenty years. Streitenberger and McDermott both have confessed. Rudner denies guilt of murder but confesses part in the plot which resulted in murder and this under the Ohio law makes him a direct principal.

Lengel was deposed for inefficiency and failure to prosecute investigation of the Mellett murder. He now has pending a mandamus action and an appeal in the courts, asking reinstatement. He has also pending a $50,000 libel suit against the Canton Daily News. A like suit by Louis Mazer will be dismissed since Mazer has confessed.

The State has charged and has proved that Editor Don R. Mellett was executed in a conspiracy to destroy his newspaper because of his attacks through the newspaper against the police department whose heads were shown to be in collusion with vice leaders. Should Lengel be convicted, other indictments are expected. Investigation points to higher-ups that directed Lengel's activities through stool-pigeons in the "underworld."

Lengel pleaded indigency and asked the court to appoint attorneys for his defense, but the request was denied. His home is owned in his wife's name and aside from that he stated that he had only a cash surrender value of $1,500 in a life insurance policy payable to his daughter. It has developed, however, that he has maintained safety deposit boxes which no one has the right to enter except himself.

Coincidental with the indictment and arrest of Lengel, the Canton Daily News received and placed on view the Pulitzer Gold Medal which it announces will be placed on permanent display in the lobby of a new building which is to be erected as a memorial to Don R. Mellett, the martyred publisher. The cornerstone for the new building will be laid on the anniversary of Don R. Mellett's death.

As showing the result of the work, the Canton City Council, Republican (the Canton Daily News is independent Democratic), unanimously passed this resolution:

"Whereas a distinct and lasting service has been rendered to the city of Canton and its citizenship by a work which has broken the domination of evil influences and which has effectually severed their connection with unworthy representatives of the people; and, whereas, this service, as a result of the prosecution of conspirators who were vice leaders, has drawn attention of the world favorably to this city after a not entirely deserved but adverse publicity; and, whereas the work done has brought honor to the city as it has to the press of the city in the award of the Pulitzer Gold Medal to the Canton Daily News, the second time this award has been made west of the Allegheny Mountains and the first time it has ever been awarded to a city of Canton's size; therefore,

"Be it Resolved, That the council of the city of Canton, representing officially the voice of the city, express its gratitude and its appreciation to the Canton Daily News for the great civic work it has accomplished and the newspaper leadership it has shown; and that council officially record the citation of honor to the Canton Daily News 'for its brave, patriotic and effective fight for the purification of municipal politics throughout the country, and for the ending of a vicious state of affairs brought about by collusion between city authorities and the criminal element, a fight which had a most tragic result in the assassination of the editor of the paper, Mr. Don R. Mellett,' and

"Be it further Resolved, That the city council go on record with the pledge to aid in leadership in sustaining Canton as the city of the Gold Medal Newspaper of the United States for the year just closed, worthy of the honor which that newspaper has brought to it."

WHEN LINDY TURNED NEW YORK UPSIDE DOWN

Millions Crammed Canyons of Broadway to Greet Returning Hero, and Reporters Battled Ocean of Humanity—Deafening Harbor Reception Upset Carefully Laid Interview Plans

By BRUCE GOULD
New York Evening Post Staff

THE world's greatest city was about to welcome the world's greatest hero, Colonel Charles A. Lindbergh.

Cover it. That was the job.

Probably never before have 7,500,000 persons suddenly turned slightly mad just because a daring youngster personified glorious youth.

Where a scanty two or three thousand had braved the chill morning mist that May 20 to see "Slim" hop off from Roosevelt Field bound for Paris, and a small number of correspondents sufficed, the world's metropolis knocked off work last Monday to see and to cheer the hero of the century, so that the welcome became a crowd story of unheard of magnitude.

There was nothing for the newspapers to do but to turn over their pages intact to the story of the occasion, and to assign almost the entire staff to get the story. President Coolidge departed for the Black Hills practically unnoticed. The New York Stock Exchange stopped winding out dollars for an entire day, the first time such an honor has been paid a living man. The world was well lost for Lindbergh.

The parade, beginning on the waters of New York harbor at Quarantine and winding up Broadway and Fifth Avenue to Central Park, was about ten miles long. Important stops were to be made when the municipal steamer discharged "Lindy" at Battery Park; when Mayor Walker welcomed the flyer at City Hall; when the Army flyer laid a wreath at the foot of the Eternal Light, on Fifth Avenue at Twenty-fourth Street, in memory of his dead comrades; when he stopped for a minute at St. Patrick's Cathedral to meet Cardinal Hayes, and finally when he stood before Governor Smith in Central Park to be presented with the Medal for Valor of New York State.

All these aspects of the tremendous reception had to be covered, not only by reporters, but by photographers, and harassed city editors were forced to sprinkle the town with men in order to get the flavor of the story.

The welcome was scheduled to begin at Quarantine, when "Lindy" was to be picked up from an Army amphibian plane and transferred to the municipal steamer

Charles Macauley, noted cartoonist, presenting Mrs. Lindbergh with a sketch of her hero son at the Newspaper Club in New York.

Macom and to the arms of the Reception Committee for Distinguished Visitors, as gloriously represented by the silk-hatted Grover Whalen. For that reason, the first line reporters, and those who were to write the complete story for the morning paper, went aboard the Macom; perhaps twenty-five reporters, and as many photographers.

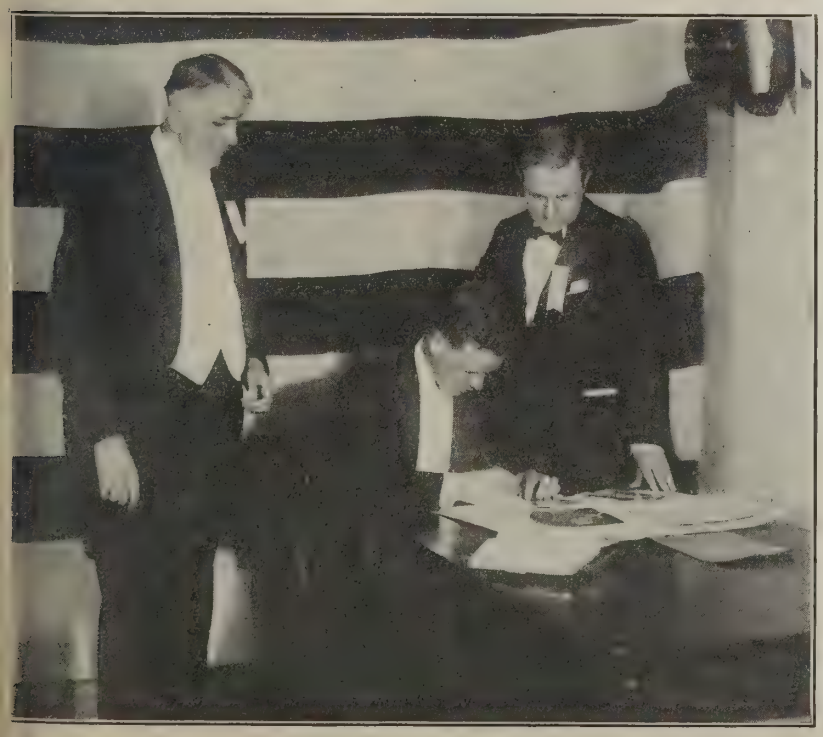
Actually, a last minute change in plans, necessitated by the motor failure of The Spirit of St. Louis at Washington, took "Lindy" first to Mitchel Field in an Army pursuit plane, from which he transferred to the original amphibian. Elaborate secrecy shrouded the Mitchel Field landing, but several papers which learned of this plan, shot reporters out to the flying field and covered his descent from the clouds.

Because of the anticipated crowds, special cards were issued to reporters who expected to board the Macom. Other cards were issued for work around City Hall. Special passes were required by the military authorities at Miller Field, from which the aerial parade of about thirty planes took off and landed.

The eight thousand policemen who guarded the parade lines were informed that ordinary police cards should be honored at other points along the line, but there is never any way to educate a crowd that a reporter must be allowed to pass if his elbows prove powerless in wedging him through a human barrier.

Two hours behind the original schedule, and one hour later than the hastily revised plan, "Lindy" dropped down on the water at Quarantine in the midst of an Armada of habor craft of every description, ranging from railroad tugs to Coast Guard destroyers and ponderous excursion boats. Immediately an uproar of cheering, shouting, screaming sirens, and hoarse whistles split the air, nearly breaking eardrums. From the time he landed until the Macom put in at Pier A, Battery Park, an hour later, the din continued. At times it was literally impossible to hear words shouted in the ear.

Under these conditions, it was necessary to get an interview. And these were not all the unfavorable conditions. Normally, when distinguished visitors are taken aboard the Macom, usually from an incoming liner, the celebrated one is quietly taken into the ship's cabin and interviewed at leisure.



But not so with "Lindy." Out in those 300 odd boats, which formed a naval phalanx about the Macom as it slowly steamed up the bay, were some thousands and thousands of madly cheering men and women. Every boat was listing to Lindbergh, and they were demanding a sight of their idol. It was imperative that he be taken on the bridge at once, and reporters were permitted less than three minutes with him while he stripped off his flying jerkin. And during that brief period, one grayhaired lady reporter attempted to win from him a detailed account of what he thought of the possibilities of transatlantic flying, despite the frowns of her more prosaic confreres.

Whalen brusquely whisked "Lindy" away, while the reporters were still trying to make up their minds what to ask him. The stormy welcome, the immensity of his popularity, and the dignity of the boy almost tongue-tied the usually bright reporters, so that he had slipped away before they were ready to begin.

Once on the bridge, he was the center of hundreds of thousands of eyes. The bay was a mass of foam as the huge naval escort churned the water alongside the Macon. So great was the din of whistles that much of the cheering could not be heard. People looked as though they were opening and shutting their mouths without purpose.

Reporters were wild. They could only look at him as everyone else was doing. Photographers were not much better off, because others were constantly getting in front of their prey. Half a dozen times police forced many a luckless newspaper man back as well.

a request was sent to Whalen, to bring "Lindy" down below for "only five minutes." The request went unanswered. It began to look hopeless. The Battery was heaving into view, and no interview.

Your correspondent became desperate, and succeeded in attracting the attention of Harry A. Bruno, associated with R. R. Blythe as personal representatives of the flyer, and publicity men for the Wright motor and Ryan monoplane, as well as other aviation interests. In a few concise words, Bruno was impressed with the necessity of at least a few words; a minute later five reporters were surrounding "Lindy."

It was like interviewing a prima donna next to a riveting machine. Questions had to be shouted. Whalen and others were plucking at Lindbergh's sleeve to win him back, as the thousands of people on all sides clamored for a sight of their hero. One reporter threw his arm about Lindbergh to prevent any sudden disappearance. A few questions were hurled at him; mostly the usual ones asking him for an interpretation of his feelings.

Lindbergh doesn't like such questions. He didn't like them when he was comparatively unknown before hopping off for Paris, and he doesn't like them any better now. What's more he refuses to answer them, firmly insisting that he will answer only questions which permit a definite reply. Out of the welter came one thought, that Lindbergh had made the flight, not because of the money prize, but because he regarded the Orteig prize as a "challenge," and thought it was up to some aviator to prove that the Atlantic could be bridged.

With the arrival at Battery Park, the land turmoil began. Reporters were restrained by police from meeting "Lindy" as he disembarked. Surrounding the Park were thousands of persons. From the cornices of the skyscrapers people hung like bats. The windows were faces; the ledges a mass of humanity. There were no telephones available.

From then on it was touch and go, as the parade swung through the skyscraper canyons of lower Broadway, lined with people on the sidewalk, and almost a living facade up both sides to the topmost story. Cameramen, posted in eyries, snapped some amazing pictures of a Manhattan crowd at its wildest, the air shimmering with torn paper and ticker tape, with people massed as far as the eye could see.

At City Hall, where a stop had been made, more reporters were posted in press boxes, telegraph instruments before them. It was feared, and rightly, that no reporter could leave the scene, and that all telephones would be blocked. But even the telegraph instruments broke down once, when the mob charged Lindbergh and overran the press boxes. In forcing the mob back, the valiant from the Woolworth Tower, the World Dome, and half a dozen other buildings which face City Hall Park, and it was hours after the parade had continued on up Layayette street past the Tombs, and swung into Fifth avenue at Ninth street before the downtown hordes had melted away.

Afternoon reporters stationed along the avenue had to do the best they could to worm their way through the masses along the sidewalks in search of telephones to shoot in their bits to the rewrite men, while the morning men rode in automobiles behind the hero and jotted it all down in notes or memories.

At Central Park, where space was available for hundreds of thousands, reporters fared better. Their press boxes were undisturbed, and the story was quieter there, the frenzied edge having been taken off by the downtown millions. But it was not until nearly six o'clock that the greatest crowd story ever written by New York newspaper men was finally all in.

Different papers handled the story in various ways. The New York Evening Post worked out a plan which was satisfactory. After a general lead, each reporter, covering a definite territory, wrote his story under a two column head. The net result was a running story of the entire parade as it developed, written by several men, all of whom had witnessed what they had written.

To name all the reporters who did stalwart work on this wildest of New York receptions would be impossible since it would be practically a census of New York newspaper men and women.

The heavy "play" given the story was shown by Variety which carried the following tabulation: Times, 15 pages; American, 10 pages; Herald Tribune, 9; World, 8; Mirror (tab.) 23; News (tab.) 16. This included news and pictures.

the arrival at Washington of America's Unknown Soldier and the death of President Wilson, both stories of infinite pathos. The gladness, freedom and neighborliness of Lindbergh's homecoming gave this story a vitality lacking on those other historic occasions."

Probably more reporters went up in the air on the Lindbergh story than on any other assignment. One of the first groups to go aloft consisted of five reporters who took off from the Hampton Roads Naval Base Friday, June 10, and flew out to sea to greet the returning hero. They were: "Larry" Sullivan, of the International News Service; Hunt Clement, of the Associated Press; Carlisle Bargeron, of the Washington Post; Whitney Bolton, of the New York Herald Tribune, and F. Raymond Daniell, New York Evening Post.

"So many planes were dipping and diving about the Memphis that it was like driving a motor car through Times Square at theatre time," said Daniell. "Collisions seemed inevitable with planes before, behind us, under and over us. It was a little too crowded for comfort."

Mrs. Evangeline Lindbergh, mother of the flyer, was the guest of the New York Newspaper Club at luncheon June 14. Col. Lindbergh, who planned to attend, was unable to be present. Mrs. Lindbergh was presented with a cartoon by Charles R. Macauley, showing Uncle Sam greeting "Lindy." The luncheon committee consisted of: Robert E. Livingston, chairman; Denis Tilden Lynch, president of the club; Louis Fehr, vice-president; William P. Beazell, past-president; R. P. Clarkson, Endicott Rich, Oscar S. Armes, Victor Lawn, Leslie H. Allen, corresponding secretary; Prof. James Melvin Lee, Miss Mageda, Mrs. Bryce Oliver, Mrs. Lee, Miss Lee, Miss Marion White, news editor, Electrical Record, and Charles R. Macauley.

ECHOES OF LINDBERGH'S U. S. RECEPTION

Boston newspapers last Saturday and Sunday handled photographs of Col. Charles A. Lindbergh's arrival and reception in Washington with great speed. Pictures taken by staff and picture syndicate photographers were rushed to Boston by airplane in time to catch the Sunday editions. Photographs of Lindbergh's arrival sent from Washington by telephoto were printed in Saturday papers.

"Only two stories out of Washington within my experience have compared in popular interest and universal emotional appeal with the Lindbergh homecoming," Robert J. Bender, general news manager of the United Press Associations told Editor & Publisher. "These were

LINDY COPY CENSORED ABOARD MEMPHIS

Capt. Bagley Insisted Upon Seeing All Copy Before It Was Sent—Ship a Floating "Tower of Babel"

By William Hillman,
I. N. S. and Universal Service Correspondent

The U.S.S. Memphis, pride of the American navy, was nothing more than a floating tower of Babel for the seven days she carried Lindbergh.

Not only were three newspapermen trying to tell the American people what Lindy was doing, thinking or saying, but everyone in America was evidently trying to tell Lindy what a marvelous feat he had accomplished or trying to invite him home or get him to sign on some dotted line.

For three days before the Memphis reached the American shore every radio station on the American continent was clamoring to be let in. Four wireless operators and three assistants were swamped. There was not a minute of the day or night, except for a period of twelve hours at midocean, when messages were not being sent or received. Forty thousand words a day is a fair guess as to the amount of traffic handled.

Under these conditions, filing news dispatches became a precarious venture. Sometimes messages were routed via London, sometimes via passing ships, sometimes by way of Washington, often by stations in the vicinity of New York.

The three correspondents were not limited in the number of words they could send, realizing, however, that much of their copy would be lost if lengthy since no assurance as to the time of arrival could be given.

But for the first time since the close of the war, American newspapermen found their copy censored.

No story was allowed to clear from the Memphis without approval of Commander Bagley, chief of staff to Vice Admiral Burrage, commanding U. S. Naval Forces in Europe. Even bulletin messages such as "The Memphis now steaming up the Potomac" had to wait for the initials of Commander Bagley.

That the censorship was not severe or annoying is due to the fact that Commander Bagley is not a meticulous martinet. He was fair in his attitude and if anything seemed objectionable to him he would suggest deletion rather than insist on it.

What was objectionable matter?

Anything that Lindbergh might not like. Was Lindbergh consulted?

No! The censor took it upon himself to decide whether the matter was proper.

The naval censorship was but a continuation of that strange isolation of Lindbergh from the world that began when Ambassador Herrick took Lindbergh in charge in Paris and standing by his side at the press conference nodded approval or shook his head as Lindbergh answered questions put by newspapermen.

Lindbergh is a difficult hero to question at any time because of his reticence, and was doubly difficult to approach after the American diplomatic and naval authorities got busy.

N. E. A. MEETING HEARS SMALL TOWN PRAISED

No More New Yorks Nor Chicagos Needed, Speaker Tells Thousand Delegates at Omaha Convention —Meredith of Quakertown (Pa.) Free Press New President—1900 Members Gained Last Year

(By telegraph to EDITOR & PUBLISHER)

OMAHA, Neb., June 15.—Charles M. Meredith, publisher of the Quakertown (Pa.) Free Press, was elected president of the National Editorial Association at the annual convention, succeeding Herman Roe, publisher of the Northfield (Minn.) News. Memphis was selected as the next convention city.

Edwin Funk, editor of the Rogers (Ark.) Democrat, who had been working for the election of L. C. Hall, publisher of the Wareham (Mass.) Courier, had the tables turned on him and was himself elected vice-president.

Secretary and treasurer will be appointed by the Executive Committee some time within the next few days.

Following are the first place prize winners at the N. E. A. Convention: The Star-Clipper, Traer, Ia., best weekly in United States; Jacob H. Strong, editor Gazette, Rhinebeck, N. Y., best weekly editorial page; Schuyler L. Marshall, editor, Republican News, St. Johns, Mich., EDITOR & PUBLISHER cup for greatest community service; The Register, Brookings, S. D., best front page; News, Montevideo, Minn., best newspaper production; Graphic, Newton, Mass., first prize in advertising contest, $1,000 cup.

This year's convention, which started Monday, was the largest in the history of the Association. Nearly 700 newspaper folk attended, and some 300 more of their friends and families accompanied them to Omaha.

Following the closing of the convention Wednesday evening, some 300 of the visiting editors left on a special train for a ten day tour of western Nebraska, the Black Hills of South Dakota, and a visit to President Coolidge's summer home. The editors are to meet the President Saturday at the State Game Lodge, the summer White House.

The bright spot of the convention came with President Roe's report, which informed the delegates that 1,900 new members had been added to the association this year, and that the year ended with a cash balance of $17,000, an increase of $4,000 over last year.

Governor McMullen, in behalf of the state; Mayor Dahlman, in behalf of Omaha; Alvin F. Johnson, president of the Omaha Chamber of Commerce; Dr. A. L. Bixby, columnist on the Lincoln (Neb.) State Journal, and Charles Kuhle, Leigh, Neb., state vice-president, all joined in cordial greeting to the editors at the opening session Monday.

President Herman Roe of the Association, responded and the convention swung briskly into a business session, which included reports of national officials and appointments of convention committees.

Among outstanding achievements for the year listed by President Roe were:

Securing favorable action for the first time by a Senate Committee on a bill to prevent unfair competition by the Post Office Department in printing return addresses on stamped envelopes.

Development of an inexpensive circulation audit plan which would bring to country newspapers the benefits resulting from verified and guaranteed circulation.

Adding to the contests sponsored by the Association to promote better newspapers, a sixth contest, the object of which is to improve newspaper production.

From the start of the convention it was evident that only Memphis and Hollywood-by-the-Sea, Florida, would be seriously considered for the 1928 convention city.

Providence, R. I., however, let it be known that it wanted the convention for Boston in 1930, when Boston would celebrate its 300th anniversary. California made a bid for 1932.

Florida received only a light vote on the first ballot and on the next round it was made unanimous in favor of Memphis.

John W. Carey, editor of the Sioux City (Ia.) Journal and president of the Iowa State Press Association, spoke briefly.

He said that while the Middle West was not in the best condition financially speaking, it was not "down and out."

C. M. Bates, publisher of the Onida (S. D.) Watchman, expressed pleasure that the editors were going to visit the Black Hills.

C. L. Hobart, publisher of the Holden (Mo.) Progress and president of the Missouri State Press Association, warned the editors against weakening the editorial department in order to strengthen the business department.

"Whenever we do that, our profession will begin to go down and we will lose the confidence and respect of the people," he said.

Among other persons who spoke briefly were: J. F. Craemer, editor Orange (Cal.) Daily News; C. M. Meredith, Quakertown, Pa.; Walter Lamb, Omaha newspaperman; Ford E. Hovey, president of the Stockyard National Bank; Charles R. Kuhle, Leigh (Neb.) World, vice-president Nebraska State Press Association; Mrs. Hester Bronson Copper, president of the Omaha Women's Press Club; Frank O. Edgecombe, Geneva (Neb.) Signal, past president of the N. E. A., and Mrs. Edgecombe, H. C. Hotaling, St. Paul, Minn., executive secretary N. E. A., and W. H. Shellberg, vice-president and general manager of Union Stockyards Company.

From early Sunday morning until they left Wednesday evening, every minute of the editors' stay in Omaha was crammed full of activity. In the evenings, the women delegates were guests of the Omaha Women's Press Club, and when their husbands were busy with meetings they were being entertained at teas, theatre parties, luncheons and sightseeing trips.

In the evenings, when not on sightseeing trips or at special entertainments, the men were guests of the Omaha business and commercial clubs.

CHARLES A. CLARK, JR.

One of the feature talks of the meeting was given by Ed Howe, Atchison, Kan., editor. Mr. Howe was very much concerned over how he was going to pay Colonel Lindbergh $1,000,000, which he said he owed the young man. Seventeen years ago Howe made the rash statement, when there was talk about flying over the ocean, that although he did not have it, he would give a million dollars to the first man to fly over the ocean. He is going to talk the proposition over with Lindbergh when the Colonel reaches St. Louis, to see if he cannot be released from his first offer.

Rapid fire philosophy, wit and sarcasm were presented to the N. E. A. Convention Tuesday afternoon by the Rev. Roy L. Smith, pastor of the Simpson Methodist Church, Minneapolis, Minn., and author of "Sentence Sermons."

"The two men who give most free unselfish service to their community," said the Rev. Smith, "are the editor and the minister. I have talked before hundreds of clubs for nothing except my dinner. They make me speak for my dinner. Some day I am going to ask my plumber and my dentist to plumb and dent for me free because we belong to the same club."

The speaker sang the praises of the small town. He said the country needed no more Chicagos, Omahas or Minneapolises, but did need more small towns which were not ashamed of being small and human and real. A few of Rev. Smith's remarks follow:

"One man in a town who thinks, dreams and believes in his town can put that town on the map.

"When wives, mothers and little children can joke about their husbands, sons, and fathers coming home drunk it will be time for newspapers to joke about prohibition."

Inland waterways, flood control and agricultural relief were among the matters included in the resolutions presented by J. C. Brimblecomb, Newton (Mass.) Graphic, chairman of resolutions committee.

A resolution set forth the necessity for the inland waterway systems including the Great Lakes—St. Lawrence Channel for ocean vessels, and the Missouri-Mississippi river projects, for control of the flood waters of the Mississippi River and for farm relief.

A resolution declared against Government printing of return address cards on the corners of stamped envelopes. Another declared in favor of lower postal rates on newspapers and magazines.

George W. Cushing, manager of the Detroit office of the American Press Association, outlined various ways by which the country newspapers would get more advertising. He advised the editors to let the national advertisers know more about their publications, circulation figures and just what kind of people read their paper.

"Advertisers want to know all they can about the small town market," he said. "Many of them are now asking themselves, 'Have we been overlooking something?' And you and I know what they have been overlooking. We know that no publication is read so closely as the home town paper.

"Why, eight of 10 of the men who sit behind the big advertising desks of the country came from the small towns and know your strength, but they haven't given the proper consideration to using your advertising because they have been educated to the value of mass circulation," he said.

In his talk Wednesday, Retiring President Roe told the editors that they would find it to their advantage to minimize all crime news.

Distinction of having the only newspaper edited and printed in a barn was claimed by F. I. Wolfe, publisher of the Grain Field Cap Sheaf, Grainfield, Kan., who attended the convention. He is the 13th owner of the paper in 17 years, but strange to say, he says that for the first time of its life, the paper is making him good money.

The Greatest Community Service cup was awarded to the St. Johns (Mich.) Republican-News, Schuyler Marshall, publisher, and Charles A. Clark, Jr., editor, for the work done by that paper in raising a fund of $160,000, in April, 1926, for a local hospital.

On October 14, 1926, the paper announced that the contract for construction of the hospital had been let. In January it printed a picture of the building which was then still under construction. The building is costing about $130,000 and the furnishings are to cost about $30,000. In addition, the newspaper has obtained pledges from Clinton county citizens and societies to furnish 24 rooms.

Other community service projects successfully carried out by the Republican-News are:

1. A campaign for fire-proof vaults for the court house, which was successful.

2. Persistent publicity from 1923 to 1925 for a new $75,000 high school.

3. Although farmers at first opposed it, the Republican-News was able to obtain the adoption of the testing of livestock in Clinton county for bovine tuberculosis. Clinton county is now an accredited area and farmers are paid a premium for their livestock. Only milk from accredited areas can be sold in Detroit after January 1, 1928.

Second place in the Community Service contest went to the Florence (Ala.) Herald, Marcy B. Darnall, publisher.

CIRCULATION IDEAS FACE ANNUAL TEST AS I. C. M. A. GATHERS IN ATLANTA

Many Technical Papers on Program Which Also Promises Interesting Discussion of Newspapers' Relations With Audit Bureau

NEWSPAPER circulation managers are moving by every land and sea route that converges on Atlanta, Ga., as this issue of EDITOR & PUBLISHER goes to press, in preparation for the annual convention of the International Circulation Managers Association at the Atlanta-Biltmore Hotel next Tuesday, Wednesday and Thursday. Early reports indicate an attendance well up to the association's standards of more than a quarter-century.

Features of a program that touches on many interesting phases of the newspaper circulation manager's duties appear in advance to be addresses by O. C. Harn, managing director, and E. W. Chandler, chief auditor, of the Audit Bureau of Circulations; and a discussion of bull-dog Sunday editions and returns as they affect relations between the A. B. C. and the newspapers. Both of these subjects have been provocative of warm discussions at meetings of publishers and Audit Bureau members during the past six months. John A. Park, publisher of the Raleigh (N. C.) Times, will welcome the circulation managers to the South on behalf of the Southern Newspaper Publishers Association.

The convention will be called to order Tuesday morning by President Charles Payne, circulation manager of the Indianapolis Star, and will work through morning and afternoon sessions on each of the three days with an early adjournment Wednesday for a trip to Stone Mountain and a barbecue. The annual banquet will be held Wednesday evening and will be followed by dancing to the music of a specially assembled orchestra. Motor trips will keep the ladies busy while convention sessions keep the men indoors.

EXECUTIVE CHANGES ON PORTLAND DAILY

J. A. Davidson, H. E. Thomas and W. R. May

CHANGES affecting the executive staffs of the news and advertising department have just been announced by the management of the Portland Oregonian.

Walter W. R. May has relinquished his activities as executive news editor, and has been named city advertising manager.

Horace E. Thomas, city editor, has been appointed city and news editor, in charge of all news and features, by Edgar B. Piper.

Joseph A. Davidson becomes a promotion manager, under W. J. Hofmann, advertising director, and will have supervision of all promotion features and will be in charge of the service and merchandising departments.

Mr. May has long been in the employ of the Oregonian, serving in various capacities in the news room. He was a copy editor for several years, then assistant city editor until he entered the service during the war. He remained in New York after leaving the service, accepting an important executive position with a shellac importing and manufacturing concern. About two years ago, he accepted a newly-created position, that of executive news editor, on the Oregonian. His business experience in New York and his study of the principles of advertising peculiarly fitted him for the position of city advertising manager, just created, and the management chose him for that place.

Mr. Thomas is likewise one of the Oregonian's long-time staff members, having been with the paper continuously as reporter, assistant city editor, and city and Sunday editor since 1905.

Mr. Davidson has been with the Oregonian for six years and has handled the merchandising department and has also had an important part in the advertising end. Prior to joining the paper's staff, he served for 12 years with the Webb Publishing company of St. Paul.

SOME NICE HEALTHY GHOSTS I HAVE KNOWN

Col. Lindbergh's Prolific Writing Traced to Carlyle MacDonald of New York Times Staff—Ghost Writing Followed Chiefly in the Field of Sports—Jack Wheeler Was One of First Big Ghosts

By PHILIP SCHUYLER

SHORTLY after his historic landing at Le Bourget field when Col. Charles A. Lindbergh had become an international celebrity, he shook hands with his first "ghost."

An accomplished writer in his aviation log book, Col. Lindbergh had had, however, no thought of a newspaper career or the writing of a book, but that ghostly contact decided him. Since that first hand-shake, the young airman has written hundreds of thousands of words under his signature. On board the Memphis after eating mess with either officers or men, he would send off his daily dispatch to the New York Times and then devote his spare time to writing "my book."

He was doing what many a celebrity has done before him. Behind every bright light one looks for a shade, and, sure enought, the "ghost" Col. Lindbergh had met in Paris had followed him to London, to Paris to Cherbourg, and on board the U. S. S. Memphis to home.

This kind of ghost, a literary ghost, is the obliging writing man or woman who helps the doer of big or famous deeds tell the world about his or her exploits. In Col. Lindbergh's case the ghost's name is Carlyle MacDonald, a healthy young man of 33, who, when he isn't ghost-writing is a member of the European staff of the New York Times.

A ghost-writer may do all the work, or may only do a minor share when a celebrity is launched upon a literary career. B. S. Garden, for instance, I am told, had to work harder when he was ghosting for "Peaches" Browning, than MacDonald has had to work for the famous New York-to-Paris flyer.

The usual procedure, becoming well-known in newspaper offices and syndicates, is for the ghost to go into conference with the lion or the "tiger woman" of the hour, and emerge saturated in impressions or confessions to be squeezed out later through the typewriter to the palpitant public.

Ghost-writing originated very naturally in the field of sports. While some of the baseball players and the professional prize fighters are college graduates, not all of them have always had the time or the patience to write about their prowess for the papers.

John N. Wheeler, now president of the Bell Syndicate, Inc., New York, and one-time editor of Liberty Magazine, was one of the first ghosts for sportsmen. He was writing sports for the New York Herald back in 1911 when the world series was contested between the Athletics and the Giants. Christy Mathewson was the big hero of the day and Wheeler began writing copy which Mathewson signed. He made a point to see Mathewson after every game. Mathewson wasn't exactly literary, but he had ideas, and, out of these daily confabs with Wheeler there grew a book, in addition to the newspaper stories. The name of the book was "Pitching In a Pinch," and its readers thought the author was none other than Christy Mathewson. The ghost got a small share in the royalties and the ballplayer got the glory, such as it was, of authorship.

Jack Wheeler is still ghosting. He has drawn up a code of ethics for the strange craft, which he told me this week.

"Either a celebrity must write his copy himself, subject to my editorship," he said, "or he must talk it over with me before I write it down. I never allow any faking. Often, if the publishers prefer it, I run an 'as told to' sub-head to the signature."

The latest bit of work of this kind the talented Mr. Wheeler has done will appear shortly in the Saturday Evening Post as "The Confessions of a Comic Artist," by Bud Fisher.

"This really is Bud Fisher's own story," Wheeler said. "We talked it over carefully together, and Mr. Fisher read every line and corrected it before it was sent to the magazine."

On occasions, Wheeler has also been the literary double for John J. McGraw, Tris Speaker, George Stallings, manager of the Boston Braves, Johnny Evers, and Frank Chance.

Being the typewriter arm for these ball players put Wheeler into the syndicate business. First he began writing a twice-a-week baseball column as Mathewson for Guy T. Viskniskki, then editor of the old McClure Syndicate, and now general manager of the Payne Syndicate, Inc. No one thought the column would last beyond the baseball season, but the public liked it so well that editors insisted that it be kept running during the winter for the stove league fans.

Ball players and team managers of today who feel the writing urge turn to Christy Walsh, head of the Christy Walsh Syndicate. It is from this office in New York that the stories signed by Babe Ruth go out. In the Babe's shadow stands Ford Frick, noted baseball writer of the New York Evening Journal.

John J. McGraw also "writes" under the Christy Walsh banner. He has had many a scribbler in his day, has McGraw. Just who is doing the job now has not been revealed.

It is the men trained to talk with their fists who most eagerly tie themselves to newspaper men when called upon to be word jugglers. Bob Edgren was one of the first ghosts of a fighting man. Bob wrote Jim Jeffries' "autobiography" before the Reno fight, and before Jim had the stuffing knocked out of him by Jack Johnson.

Wiliam Slavens McNutt slipped into the ghostly shoes of the Wild Bull of the Pampas, Luis Angelo Firpo, now selling automobiles in the Argentine. Having Bill nearby was one of the luckiest things that happened to Firpo that night he pushed or knocked Dempsey from the ring only to be knocked out himself on the rebound. As Firpo lay unconscious on the mat, his full heartbroken story of "Why I Got Licked by Jack Dempsey" was on the cables on its way to a number of South American newspapers. McNutt had done his job well. He wrote the story before its author came to.

Jack Sharkey only last week signed a contract with the New York World News Service. That means a little more work for Ned Brown, the well known boxing writer on the World staff. Brown and Benny Leonard were in constant touch with each other at Atlantic City last year, when Benny was writing signed stories for the World, predicting that Dempsey would defeat Tunney.

Frank Mencke, on the staff of the King Features Syndicate can also be Jack Dempsey—on paper. He helped Dempsey when the fighter wrote his life.

Henry Farrell, who is the sports editor of the United Press, has also done a bit of ghost writing. He is of the opinion that it doesn't pay very well, though, and takes far too much time. He wrote the autobiography of Jack Britton, former welter-weight champion of the world.

Not all athletes need literary assistance. Mary Browne, tennis and golf star, writes what Farrell describes as "nearly perfect" copy, while Helen Wills, who writes and draws for the United Feature Syndicate, refuses to have any assistance whatever.

Bobby Jones, a Harvard graduate, came into the Bell Syndicate to sign contract, and Mr. Wheeler said:

"I suppose O. B. Keeler, of Atlanta, will help you write your copy."

Jones said no.

"I write my own stuff," he added, and took from his pocket the first article he had written in long hand coming from Atlanta to New York by train.

Robert Harlow, a former Boston newspaper man, and now manager for Walter Hagen, helps his client on literary matters.

Even explorers, when they are busy exploring, like to have somebody around to jot down cables for them and write the spot news that appears in the newspapers under their signatures. The leader of the exploring expedition, who, after he returns will make enough money to go back again by lecturing to vicarious thrill hunters, usually can write himself, but doesn't spurn the assistance of a ghost.

James Wharton, thus, a staff member of the North American Newspaper Alliance, has written thrilling copy under the by-line of Roald Amundsen.

Queen Mary wrote for North American Newspaper Alliance without any ghostly aid. She scorned it. But Phil Stong, now a member of the staff of Liberty Magazine, corrected the royal spelling.

To be a figure in a sensational divorce suit or murder case will frequently make a writer out of a pretty woman. Had "Peaches" Browning been ordered to keep a lengthy diary before her affair with Edward W. ("Daddy") Browning she would have probably refused point blank.

But 18,000 words or so of her "Honeymoon Diary" were published. B. S. Garden of the Famous Feature Syndicate really responsible for this great creative work, is not overly proud of it, he said this week. He has done other things he is prouder of, such as writing news for the Buffalo Courier, the Philadelphia Public Ledger, and the Chicago Tribune.

Jack Lait, one time managing editor of the New York American and now of King Feature Syndicate, is widely known as a short-story writer himself and also may well rate the title of "Broadway Celebrity." The same Jack played ghost for Ruth Brown Snyder after she and Judd Gray were convicted of murder.

Gertrude Ederle swam the channel, and crossing with her in a boat was Julia Harpman, formerly of the New York Daily News, and the wife of Westbrook Pegler. Mrs. Pegler wrote many thousands of words on "Trudy" first.

Editors believe the public likes first person stories. That is the usual answer given in support of the ghost-writing system.

"If the man who did it tells it, the story is believed and increases tenfold in reader interest," they say.

The first person pronoun, once shunned assiduously by the writing craft, has become an idol to be worshipped, even if the "I" is not the "I" at all, but a hard working newspaper man, and clever writer, who can make money easily in the shadow of the lion of the hour.

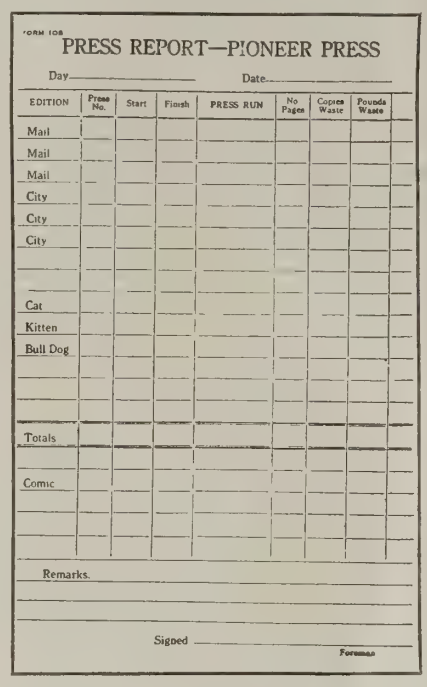
FORM-SHEETS THAT SAVE NEWSPAPER WASTE

Press Room Records Vary from Barest Outline of Operations to "Play-by-Play" Report Listing Every Detail from Receipt of Stereo Plates to Delivery of Papers to Carriers

REPORT blanks which record the daily dash of the newspaper forces between the composing room and the street delivery door are among the most interesting of the newspaper "red-tape" sheets which have been collected by EDITOR & PUBLISHER in recent weeks. Here, as in other departments, a diversity of information is requested daily by publishers of their departmental chiefs. Some want only the bare bones of the daily mechanical accomplishment; other want what might be called a "play-by-play" report, coupled with an inventory of material on hand at the opening of the day's work and that remaining when the job is finished.



The blank in the collection before the writer which packs the greatest amount of information into the smallest compass is that used by the Raleigh (N. C.) Times pressroom, a sheet 5½ inches wide and 8¼ inches deep, printed on waste news and punched for permanent filing. The publisher learns from this form the number of pages in each edition, the time the last mat was received by the pressroom for each edition, the time the press started, when the edition was run off, the gross print, number of papers spoiled, and the net run delivered to the mail and carrier forces. That information is carried in six lines at the top of the sheet.

Next he learns about his white paper stock—the serial number of each roll opened, its width, its net weight, the poundage of white waste and the name of the paper manufacturer. Totals are provided for the columns on net weight of paper rolls and of white wastage. No provision is apparently made for a report of printed waste, except in the pressroom notation of number of copies spoiled.

A single line reports the number of matrices used and the number spoiled.

Next comes a short inventory of material on hand, most of which belongs to the composing and stereotype departments rather than the pressroom—wide and narrow rolls of paper, new linotype metal, new stereotype metal, number of ink drums, full and empty, number of empty dross drums, poundage of dross on hand, and number of empty cores, long and short.

The last inch of the sheet does double duty. The left hand half gives a report, available for payroll and cost-checking, of the number of hours on duty served by each member of the press crew. The right hand half is reserved for whatever remarks the pressroom foreman cares to place over his signature.

The St. Paul Pioneer Press records the starting and finishing time of each press on the regular editions, also on the fancifully-named predates and on the colored Sunday comics, which are run through during the week. Waste is also watched carefully. This form is 5½ x 8½ inches.

The Chattanooga (Tenn.) News, like the Raleigh Times a six-day evening paper with a somewhat larger operation, requires several details not shown on the Raleigh sheet. Lost time and running time on each edition and number of roll breaks are reported to the News publisher in addition to the detailed time of receipt of stereotype places for each edition and time of starting and stopping of the press. Check is also kept on the dials of the press counter at start and finish of each edition, showing the gross run and deducting spoils to arrive at the net run. Number of pages for each edition is also reported. At the foot of the 8x14 newsprint sheet is a daily report of paper rolls used, with ample blanks for serial numbers and weights of the 72-inch, 54-inch and 36-inch rolls. The 72-inch stock is given a double column 16 lines deep. Waste is reported in pounds for wrappers, white, core, printed, and total, and a running inventory of paper stock on hand before run, received during the day, used, and on hand after run, concludes the report.

Covering one of the greatest pressroom operations in the country, and therefore necessarily elaborate, is the double-sheet report used by the Detroit News. A detailed report is given of the performance of each of 12 presses on the succession of editions which pours all day from this paper's great battery. In its essentials, the report gives the same pressroom data as that requested on the two previous examples, with the amplification due the ten-fold dimensions of the day's business covered. Two new features appear on the second sheet. One asks for a report of waste on the state and subsequent editions, showing the total pages, number of copies and total poundage of total

STATE PRESS DELEGATION TOURS NEW YORK AND LONG ISLAND

Members and guests of the New York State Press Association, celebrating its seventy-fifth year by a trip to New York City and Long Island, were entertained at dinner by the New York Times, at whose plant the above photograph of the group was made.

LONG ISLAND TOUR FOR SUMMER MEETING

Special Train and New Hotels for New York State Press Group Celebrating Its 75th Anniversary

Nearly 300 members of the New York State Press Association returned to their homes early this week from the Long Island tour and pilgrimage which completed the 75th anniversary of the founding of the association. The spring meeting is designed mainly for pleasure, following the winter business session.

Long Island hospitality began Friday morning when the editors boarded the special train furnished by the Long Island Railroad. From that time until late Saturday night the members were the guests of the Long Island Chamber of Commerce and the various local organizations which co-operated in the entertainment all along the route. Thursday afternoon and evening the guests were entertained by the Merganthaler Linotype Company at its plant in Brooklyn and at the New York Times plant.

The first stop was at Oyster Bay, where the grave of the late Theodore Roosevelt was visited. At Patchogue, the village, the Chamber of Commerce and the Round Table Club co-operated in a Long Island duck dinner, and at Southampton the visitors were taken on an auto tour of the beautiful shore section. The Argus and the Advance in Patchogue issued welcome numbers, the latter publication issuing a 24-page edition.

The party arrived at Montauk Point for a banquet, overnight rest and breakfast at the new Montauk Manor. A tour of the end of the Island by auto and a visit to the surrounding playspot development were included in the stay. Historical reminiscence of the early days of Long Island as well as of the State Press Association featured the banquet.

A surprise of the occasion was the first issue of the Montauk Mirror, which made its bow at the banquet. It is a four-column six-page paper edited by Lawrence F. Deutzman.

After trips along the shore Saturday morning the party again boarded the special train for the return trip via the south shore. At Canoe Place Inn, the editors were luncheon guests of the management.

The demonstration farm at Medford was the next stop, where Hal B. Fullerton, Director of Agriculture, spoke on the agricultural development of the island.

At Jamaica the Brooklyn Eagle took charge of the pilgrimage with a bus tour to Coney Island. The newly completed Half Moon Hotel management was host at another banquet. The guests then had their choice of an evening with the management of the Steeplechase and Luna Park as hosts. The Coney Island Times issued a special edition of welcome to the guests. E. G. Martin, of the Eagle, acted as toastmaster.

President Elmer E. Conrath of the Cuba Patriot and Field Secretary Jay W. Shaw of the New York State Press Association co-operated with the Long Island officials in planning the trip.

BORAH MAY FLY HALF-WAY TO ADDRESS PACIFIC COAST AD CONVENTION

PORTLAND, Ore., will be host to the advertising profession of the Pacific Coast June 19 to 22, at a convention that promises to be one of the most inspiring and instructive gatherings of ad men ever held.

Transcending even national interest is likely to be the address of Senator William E. Borah of Idaho, chairman of the senate foreign relations committee, who will speak on "The Pacific."

The senator's address is to be the feature of an inspirational meeting to be held at Portland's public auditorium, seating 6,000 persons, Sunday afternoon. Evidence of the interest that will attach to Senator Borah's address is the arrangement of the National Broadcasting company to broadcast the address over the "Orange Network," comprising powerful radio stations in every important city on the Pacific Coast.

The convention management almost lost their principal speaker on account of a foreign delegation coming to Washington to confer with members of the senate committee on matters pertaining to foreign debts. This might make him a day late in reaching Portland.

The convention management immediately arranged for the senator to fly from Washington to Chicago, and to continue westward in a special car attached to the fast mail train. The flight from Washington to Chicago, if Senator Borah takes advantage of the arrangement, would be made with Oakley G. Kelly, famed transcontinental flier.

Other prominent speakers include C. King Woodbridge, president of the International Advertising Association and manager of the Electric Refrigeration Company, Detroit, Mich., on "The Value of Organized Advertising."

Frank T. Carroll, advertising director of the Indianapolis News and president of the Association of Newspaper Advertising Executives, and L. M. Barton, advertising manager of the Chicago Daily News and secretary-treasurer of "The 100,000 Group of American Cities," are to speak at the convention.

Mrs. Bertha Landes, mayor of Seattle, will tell the advertising men what kind of advertising appeals to the housewives. Paul Shoup, executive vice-president of the Southern Pacific Company, will speak on "What Community Advertising Means to the Average Man." Harold J. Stonier, vice-president of the University of Southern California and president of the Los Angeles Advertising Club, has as his subject, "Building the Era of the Pacific Through Advertising."

A number of other widely-known advertising authorities of the east, middle west and south, appear on the convention program. In addition to the general sessions, there are 14 departmental programs.

The main dining room of the Multnomah Hotel, Portland, where the convention sessions are to be held, has been given over for what is believed will be the largest and most comprehensive exhibition of the advertising arts ever assembled.

On the entertainment program is featured a "Night in Rosaria," when some of the spectacular scenes from Portland's famous Rose pageant will be repeated. A trout breakfast in the mountains, tours over the scenic Columbia River Highway and Mt. Hood Loop, "Stunts Night," and other events have been planned for the ad men, business executives and civic leaders who are planning to join with the ad man in their convention.

A. N. A. VOTES RESEARCH FUND

Sets Aside $1,000 to Send Professor On Study Tour in July

To provide first hand advertising studies for classroom use and, at the same time, of value to members, the Association of National Advertisers, through its committee on cooperation with University Professors, has agreed to make an appropriation, not to exceed $1,000 for research work by the National Association of the Teachers of Marketing and Advertising.

The appropriation is to be used for salary and traveling expenses of an appointee of the latter's Committee of Research, who, during next July and August, will spend his time working up material on a special phase of the trend of advertising rates.

Heretofore the Association of National Advertisers has confined its university cooperation chiefly eo encouraging the preparation of case studies by individual members. The Corona Typewriter Company (now L. C. Smith & Corona Typewriters, Inc.), the Armstrong Cork Company and The Parker Pen Company have contributed such studies

SMILING TURNDOWN FOR HIS HANDOUTS APPRECIATED BY THIS ADVERTISER

He'll Take All Free Space He Can Get With Paid Schedule, But Respects Firm Refusal—Does Not Respect Vacillating Policy or "Smirking Willingness"

By SAM SPARKS

DO the big national advertisers expect too much for their money? Are they too insistent upon the publishing of free publicity?

The publisher's viewpoint has been given from time to time but what about the advertiser himself?

The present writer is a member of the copy department of one of the big national advertisers now in the midst of an extensive newspaper advertising campaign. All of the newspapers used by this advertiser were asked to publish free publicity stories, not because something was wanted for nothing, but because the advertiser wanted all the publicity that could be had and was being obtained by other advertisers. With advertisers, it is a matter of self-defense—if their competitors are given space for the publication of propaganda, they feel that they should receive like treatment.

But this is an experience article, rather than one of opinion so let's see what the advertiser demanded (?) and how the newspaper publisher accepted or rejected (?) it.

The "free publicity" article which publishers were asked to use related to the care and operation of a device widely used in rural homes. In the letter accompanying the story it was made clear that it was offered for publication only if it were not contrary to the policy of the newspaper. Many acceptances were received and many rejections. It is with the rejections that we are now concerned. The advertisers, be it remembered, are customers of these publishers.

Here, in part, is what the "advertising manager" of a newspaper with "government sworn" daily circulation of slightly more than 3,000 says:

"I did not feel that you should ask for the paper as it seems to me that we have been putty (sic!) good to you people. * * * * Now with all due respect to you people I think that you have had all that is coming to you and a little bit more. I have never had an advertiser that asked for more than this and hope I am yet to get one with this idea, but he is due for disappointment.

"Now in regard to this article, yes it is just one more and it will please you just a little type and a column that would otherwise be wasted with other material that is less interesting to my readers.

"But why all this fuss asking for our view on this matter. Silence on our part ought to have governed your conclusion on the matter. Now if I say yes we'll run it you will say 'Good, we slipped another one over on him look at all we got for our money. Ain't they a bunch of saps?' This is the way I look at this matter.

"Now in conclusion I am going to put it squarely up to you I am inclosing you a postcard. If you really think that you ought to have it, write so on the card and it will be in our next issue after receipt of same."

We didn't have the heart! And the writer regrets that by ignoring the foregoing letter he probably encouraged this "advertising manager" (who apparently also is the owner of the newspaper) to believe that his "smart" letter had the desired effect.

Certainly the recipient of such a letter would hardly feel that it was contrary to that publisher's policy to use free publicity. As to any other feeling that may have been aroused by the letter—that may be left to your imagination.

Here is a more conciliatory letter—in fact, it shows clearly that the publisher "aims to please":

"It is against our rules to run these free readers, as we are asked to run acres of them and cannot possibly do it; however, if you say you have a schedule coming, we will be glad to break the rule in your honor. Hurry with the advertising."

When is a rule not a rule, or a policy not a policy?

Now then listen to this one which indicates that there is only one thing in the wide world that would influence the publisher to violate an ironclad rule.

"We frequently have seen your advertising in the Saturday Evening Post and we know something of the Post rate. We never have seen any of your publicity articles there. Whenever any appear please command us and we will give at least proportionate space."

Clever, eh what? But does it "sell" the newspaper to its customers? Hardly!

"It is not our policy to run free articles of this kind, but in this case we will make an exception," says another. "The article will run along at the same time your advertising campaign starts."

Another: "Our stand has always been firmly against such news matter. But on the other hand we value the . . . contract very highly and for this reason we will be glad to carry the news story sent to us."

What a relief to receive the following:

"We have your form letter dated April 18, in reference to article about . . . . that you would like to have inserted in our news columns.

"We did not find the previous article available for such use, and we will not be able to use the article you now submit.

"The policy of our paper is to keep the news columns free from advertising matter; first, because we have more news matter that we buy and pay for than we can get in the paper; second, because we make for you and other advertisers a better advertising medium when we adopt this policy, and let our readers know that the news columns are free from advertising and propaganda."

And how does the advertiser take a "turndown" of this kind? A later letter from the same publisher will make this clear:

"Your letter of April 26 is so refreshing that we must write to thank you for your broadminded view of the matter of publicity for advertisers, and we assure you that we appreciate your reception of the statement of our position on such matters.

"It is the policy of this newspaper to spend its money to make a good newspaper, which we believe makes a good advertising medium. Every day we have matter paid for by us that we are unable to get in the paper. It would, therefore, be poor newspapering, as well as bad policy, to fill the paper with propaganda or publicity for advertisers and leave out real, live news matter.

"We wish to assure you that our advertising department is desirous of doing everything that it legitimately can to make your advertising campaign a success, and we shall render you every co-operation in that regard."

The way to say "no" is firmly. Not with a scowl, but with a smile.

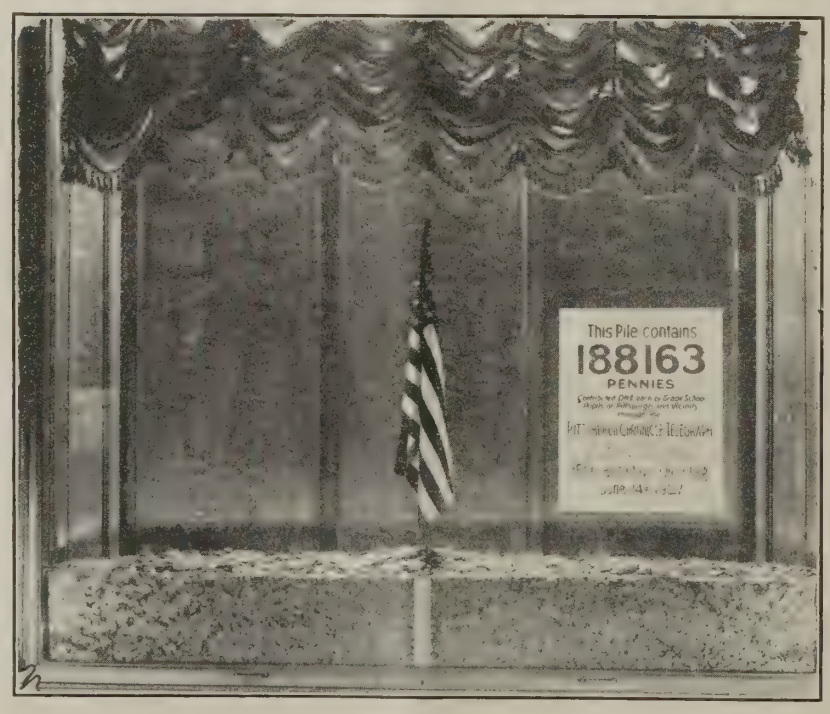
Here, for instance, is the businesslike way in which one publisher did it:

"As you state in your letter, we are very much interested in the success of your advertising campaign. We want all of our advertisers to find the use of our space profitable. For that reason we are always glad to extend all possible co-operation to advertisers, other than to grant free space in our paper to publicity articles. You will appreciate, of coarse, that were we to give such space to one advertiser we would be obligated to give it to all. Such a practice would destroy reader interest and reader confidence in our paper, and it would be certain, ultimately, to depreciate its value as an advertising medium.



"We are confident that you will recognize the justice of the position which we are taking, and accept it as a satisfactory explanation of our failure to make use of the copy which you furnished."

Of course this letter brought a cordial response, the advertiser reiterating that it was not his intention to have publishers violate their policies.

It would seem from the many short-sighted letters written by persons in more or less responsible positions on the publishers' staffs that these individuals regard many of their advertisers not as customers but as vultures. As a matter of fact the advertiser does not want "something for nothing" but he does want all that he can legitimately obtain for his money, and he would far rather pay for his advertising in a newspaper which, as a result of definite clean-cut policy, is highly regarded in its community, than to obtain column after column of "free publicity" in one with a vacillating policy or with a smirking willingness to do whatever is asked.

It is not the desire of the present writer to tell publishers how to succeed as such, but it is his belief that there are right and wrong ways in dealing with customers and both are illustrated in this article. After all the newspaper publishing business cannot be so much different from any other business—the publisher has something to sell and good salesmanship should be used in selling it. And it should not be necessary to give something free with each purchase.

CHILDREN'S PENNIES HONOR FLAG

Display of 188,163 pennies, each one representing a gift of a grade school pupil to a fund raised by the Pittsburgh Chronicle-Telegraph, co-operating with the American Flag Day association, for the erection of a memorial tablet to commemorate the 150th anniversary of the birth of the American Flag. The pennies were massed by the Union Trust Co. and kept on display in one of its windows for more than a week.

CHILDREN GIVE 188,163 PENNIES TO FUND

Flag Memorial Campaign of Pittsburgh Chronicle Telegraph Highly Successful—40 Full Pages of Names Printed

The Pittsburgh Chronicle Telegraph recently completed an unusual newspaper campaign which resulted in the erection of a handsome memorial commemorating the American flag's sequi-centennial with a fund of 188,163 pennies contributed by the grade school pupils of the district.

The flag memorial is a stone monument bearing a large bronze tablet inscribed with a tribute to Old Glory and a few lines explaining that the memorial was made possible by penny gifts of 188,163 school children to a fund raised by the Pittsburgh Chronicle Telegraph, co-operating with the American Flag Day Association, under whose auspices the unveiling took place. It rests near the entrance to Schenley park, and was dedicated on Flag Day, June 14.

Under the heading "The Tele's Flag Birthday Honor Roll," the Telegraph published from day-to-day the names of pupils contributing to the fund. When the plan was launched the daily hoped to keep abreast by publishing these names immediately upon receipt, but early in the second week this was found to be impossible. The space allotted to the Honor Roll gradually grew from three columns a day in the early stages of the campaign to two full pages daily toward the close. Set in agate, the 188,163 names filled about 40 full pages.

The plan was announced April 25, and contributions were received up to May 21. It was approved prior to launching by the superintendents of the city, county and parochial schools.

After the close of the campaign, the Union Trust Company co-operated with the paper to the extent of amassing 188,163 pennies and placing them on display in a window in the arcade leading to its banking rooms. The interesting exhibit was shown for more than a week, during which it attracted a great deal of attention. The dimensions of the pile of pennies were 100 inches long, 14 inches wide and 13 inches deep, or more than 10 cubic feet in volume.

Statistics compiled at the close of the campaign showed that the 188,163 pennies weighed 1,271 pounds; that is piled perpendicularly they would extend into the air 922 feet, about 1⅔ times the height of the Washington monument.

NEWS MEN RUN AGROUND

A group of newspaper men narrowly escaped disaster last week when the Oheka II, new yacht purchased by Otto H. Kahn in Germany went aground off West Point on a speed trial down the Hudson. In the party were James Robbins, New York World; Seabury Lawrence, New York Times; William H. Taylor, New York Herald Tribune; and Henry Farrell, United Press. At the time of the accident the ship was making 32 miles an hour. None was hurt.

The Largest Circulation In Michigan is of . . . . . the home variety

The Detroit News Has For 54 Years Been The HOME newspaper

Home circulation means multiple circulation, multiple advertising force and multiple results.

In Detroit the home newspaper is moreover the newspaper with the largest numerical circulation, making it indeed a fortunate market for advertisers, seeking economical sales outlets.

It costs less to cover the Detroit market thoroughly and impressively because only one newspaper need be used.

Of its great circulation of more than 353,000 Sundays and 330,000 week days, 80% of the Sunday and 95% of the week day circulation is concentrated in the local trading area—the most important unit for selling via the medium of the newspaper.

That this is a well established fact is evidenced in the position of The Detroit News during the last ten years in advertising in America. This paper having occupied regularly during that time either first, second or third place, and carrying more advertising than its two local competitors combined.

The News is Detroit's accepted source of information—the official organ of every householder. Regardless of what other newspaper may be taken for this or that special feature, The News is the one newspaper that is read by the whole family, regularly. And it is the family's purchase that makes the dent in the dealers' shelves.

KEY TO CONSUMER BUYING ABILITY

Statistical Rating of Rhode Island Counties and Cities for Products of General Appeal, in Six Major Classes of Quality and Cost—An Original Simplified and Tested Formula from Basic Data

By NELSON H. SEUBERT

Copyright 1927 by Editor & Publisher Company. All rights are reserved and warning is given that reproduction of these results, in whole or in part, without written permission of Editor & Publisher Co., will constitute copyright infringement.

CONSIDERABLE interest has been aroused among buyers of advertising space and sales executives by the series of articles, indices, maps and graphic charts of consumer buying ability which have appeared for several New England States since May 21. The fifth of the series, covering Rhode Island, is published herewith and next week's issue, with Connecticut, will conclude the New England area.

Last week an interesting, and not unexpected, criticism, was expressed against the use of income tax returns as a factor to reflect the buying ability of the rural dairy farmer of Vermont. It was objected that due to a 10-20 per cent exemption for depreciation of machinery, 20 per cent for depreciation of live-stock, 5-10 per cent for house rent, milk, butter, eggs, meats, vegetables, etc., the cash income of a Vermont farmer should be increased by amounts ranging from $500 to $1,700 to approximate his real annual income.

There is no doubt that this is true regarding Vermont, a predominantly rural state, and that it prevails also in most rural farming regions. The question as to whether this condition tends toward underestimating the buying ability of the farmer in comparison with that of the city or suburban resident is not new—it has been under discussion for many years in political and economic circles and it probably never will be settled to the complete satisfaction of both sides.

However, since these index numbers are primarily designed for the use of manufacturers and sales organizations selling consumer merchandise of mass appeal, and not farm specialties, it seems reasonable to urge that the following points be kept in mind.

1. The $500 or $1,700 which the critic of this theory proposed should be added to the cash income of Vermont farmers is a book value, set aside to take care of depreciation, of machinery, live-stock, farm buildings, fences, etc., and hence it is not available for the purchase of consumer merchandise.

2. That the farmer's cost of doing business is balanced and offset in the city by similar situations in the cost of doing business paid by the retail grocer, the retail druggist, the lawyer and the doctor who maintain their own offices and also by thousands of other small shops and retail stores in the cities.

3. That tax exempt securities, which are largely held in the cities and their suburbs, also help to balance this apparent statistical injustice against the farmer.

4. The big factor of social and business competition in the cities keeps this buying ability active and increases the probability of selling merchandise. For instance, the writer knows of a very wealthy man who maintains a luxurious apartment on Park avenue, New York City, where he lives four or five months a year. The rest of the time he spends on his 3,000-acre farm in the Middle West. It is stated that it costs him more than twice as much to live in New York and keep up his apartment during four or five months as it does to live on and maintain the farm for the rest of the year.

The exemptions that the city man makes in his income returns are not so emphasized as are those of the farmer, but they exist and with the growing preponderance of urban over rural population, it is possible that they offset in

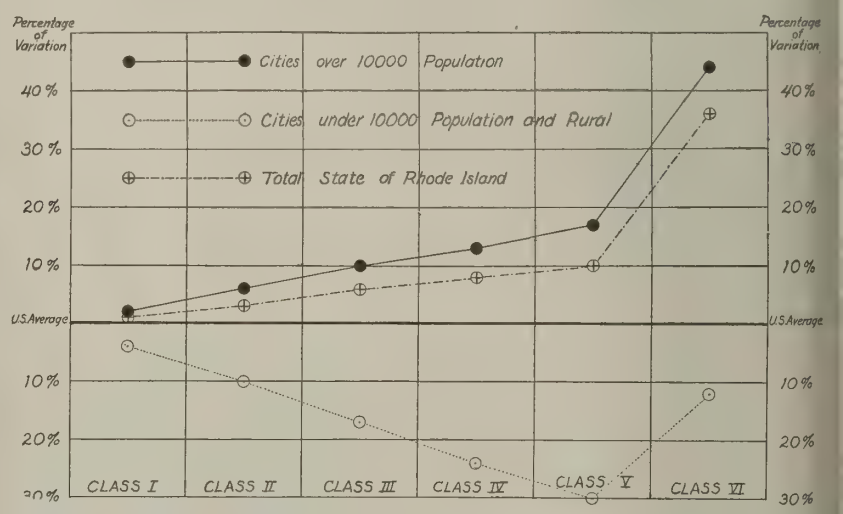
THE first step is to determine as accurately as possible which of the six classifications best fits your product. The figures under this class in the chart are the only ones that you use. When this is determined, comparison can be made between the buying power of any city or trading area and your sales or advertising circulation by the following method:

Take your sales figures or your advertising circulation figures of the particular city or trading area under consideration. Translate these figures into a percentage of your total figures for the United States. Carry these figures out four places beyond the decimal point (i.e. If your sales are about 2 per cent, you might have an actual figure something like this, 1.9837 per cent).



The next step is to point off four places in the buying power index which then becomes a percentage of the total buying power of the United States. You now have two comparable percentages. A comparison of these two percentages will immediately show you whether you are placing enough sales or advertising effort on that city or trading area. Any group of cities, counties or trading areas can be compared by merely adding together the figures of the various cities or counties that make up the area or group. Then follow a similar process as outlined above.

All cities of more than 10,000 population, according to latest Census estimates, are indicated on this outline map of

Censorship gives Extra Value to Space

THE CONFIDENCE established by The New York Times censorship is one of the extra values of space in its advertising columns.

The Times censorship is primarily to protect its readers against frauds, catchpenny offers, extravagant claims. It also protects advertising. Censorship does not permit honest advertisers, the vast majority, to be subjected to the fraudulent competition of the dishonest few.

Advertisers admitted to The Times columns reap the fruits of the strong confidence its censorship establishes.

The censorship of The Times is not infallible. But The Times investigation of advertising is, it believes, as careful and painstaking in its endeavor to exclude whatever is undesirable as it is possible for any newspaper to maintain.

the balance the farmer's well known and justified privileges.

Without prejudice and in all good nature, we venture again to state that this analysis is based upon the factors of population and income. We still think it obvious that a given number of the human animal, known to have money available for spending, will purchase a more or less definite amount of necessities and luxuries, and the more of him that have money, the more his purchases will extend to the higher-priced goods.

Here then are the descriptions of the six classifications and their corresponding weighting of population and income:

Class 1 Cheap necessities and bulk staples. Population 70 per cent. Number of incomes 10 per cent.

Class II Moderate priced necessities and packaged staples. Population 70 per cent. Number of incomes 30 per cent.

Class III Quality priced necessities and staples. Cheap luxuries and low priced non-staples. Population 50 per cent. Number of incomes 50 per cent.

Class IV Fancy priced necessities and staples. Moderate priced luxuries and non-staples. Population 30 per cent. Number of incomes 70 per cent.

The picture presented in this issue is one of a predominantly urban state, with closely concentrated buying power in its cities and an unusually high buying power in the small cities and rural districts. The average for the entire state of Rhode Island closely parallels that for the cities of more than 10,000 population on the graphic chart, while the curve for the rural sections and small cities shows capacity for the purchase of high-priced luxuries to a degree not often found. The comparatively few farmers in Rhode Island evidently find a rich market for their wares in the great cities of the region.

Joliet Agent Insured 731 Applicants in May by Using 15 Newspaper Pages—Represented $838,500 Worth of Business

Officers of the Peoria Life Insurance Company this week hailed Joseph F. Skrinar, district manager of the company in Joliet, Ill., as the champion business producer in the world—and Mr. Skrinar, who filed 731 applications for $838,500 business in May, has a layout of 15 single-page newspaper advertisements run during April and May to show how he did it. President Emmett C. May, of the Peoria Insurance Company, designated May as "rose month" for his field men, requesting each of them to send him a rose for every $1,000 worth of business written in the month. When Mr. Shrinar got the request he decided to do something different. He took a page ad in the Joliet Herald-News to announce to his community that "I am going to take more applications for insurance policies during May than any other agent for any insurance company in any country in a single month."

He kept using newspaper copy and 14 more pages appeared during the next two months notifying the public of his drive and what insurance was and why it should be bought. Through the newspapers he talked to women of Joliet, advising them to discuss insurance with their husbands. He followed it up with various appeals of similar nature; he used circular letters when the prospects came in.

"Newspaper advertising put it over," he wrote President May when he wrote the home office as to whether or not he should send his bouquet of 838 roses "by freight or express."

Printed So He Who Runs May Read

MODERN NEWSPAPERS, reflecting the spirit of the times, are produced in a dizzying whirl of speed. The human machine for gathering and writing news, the almost human composing and printing machinery, are all geared high. Too frequently, however, the acceleration ceases there and scant allowance is made for rapid reading.

It is an important point. In these days when only odd moments are devoted to newspaper reading, when newspapers are "glanced through" and not read word for word, attractiveness and legibility grow indispensable. The paper that would keep apace must literally be "printed so he who runs may read."

The publishers of The Distinguished Newspaper, alive to the tastes and tendencies of their reader-customers, have met this necessity. An instance is presented on the two pages following, which shows the front page of The Distinguished Newspaper dressed for the "running reader." Its head schedule, designed for rapid reading, is freely patterned after the Bodoni Bold dress of the New York Herald Tribune, and for a text face it employs the exceedingly legible Ionic No. 5. To insure production speed, to maintain efficiency and promote economy, it is Linotype set throughout.

Heads in Lower Case Gaining Favor Over All-Cap Head Dress

Caps and Lower Case Are Much Easier to Read Than Lines Composed in Capitals Throughout

New York Tribune First to Adopt Style

Many Newspapers Following Lead in Line with Policy of Adding Readers by Increasing Readability

Newspaper after newspaper is dropping the all-cap style of headdress in favor of the headline in caps and lower case. To the unknowing, this change might appear to be a passing fancy, a fad in newspaper make-up as unexplainable as any other fad, but to the editor who has kept abreast of the times the steady increase in the number of converts to the newer fashion in headdress is no surprise. He realizes that it is a change based upon sound reason and not upon some widespread whim.

Is Easier to Read

Typographical authorities have been strong in their recommendation of the change upon the ground that caps and lower case are far easier to read than caps alone. The late Benjamin Sherbow, an outstanding crusader for readable type styles, had this to say in his book, "Effective Type-use for Advertising":

"Display lines in all capital letters are not as easy to read as capitals and lower case. All-capital heads and subheads should be avoided as far as possible. In all my work on the type make-up of magazines and newspapers during the last half-dozen years, I have not used a single all-cap headline. The editors I have worked for have generally agreed with me that the headline in upper and lower case is not only easier to read but gives the page a friendlier, more inviting look.

"I have talked with many newspaper editors and publishers on the same subject. They are a bit harder to convince, but in several instances I have succeeded in getting newspapers to adopt the upper and lower case heading throughout."

The first newspaper to adopt the lower

Boxes Contribute Color And Balance Make-Up

Oddities in the day's news, stories with a human twist, offer the editor an excellent opportunity to vary the make-up of his front page, or for that matter, any other page. These stories may be set in a narrower measure of the body type, leaded a bit fuller than straight matter, headed with an italic line and enclosed in a simple box.

The result will be a block of type that will have a lighter color and afford a pleasant contrast to the rest of the text. Kept short and rectangular in shape, the box offers an excellent means of varying a regular make-up.

Bodoni Bold Is Versatile Face for Newspapers

Versatility, an attribute desirable in any type face doing duty in a newspaper office, is present in an unusual degree in the Bodoni Bold offered on Linotype matrices. In the first place, it is an admirable substitute for the frequently used Gothic faces because it combines beauty of design with the heaviness that is the only worthwhile feature of the block types. It is altogether legible, affords an excellent word count in comparison with other faces of an equivalent weight, and permits of close spacing in a line because of its readily recognized letter forms.

All of these are characteristics which will commend Bodoni Bold to the newspaper publisher for use as a head letter. To the list may be added the fact that it is available on the Linotype in a wide range of sizes, both in the roman and in italic, and consequently may be used in a variety of heads. The possibilities of such varied treatment of headlines is exemplified on this page, where every head employs no other face than Bodoni Bold.

A wide range of advertisements may also be attractively set in Bodoni Bold. As a matter of fact, there is a definite typographic trend toward its use in advertising, for it is the most legible of the black face types that lend themselves to the so-called "modern manner." A glance through any of the current periodicals will show examples of the style and suggest ways in which it can be applied to

Ionic Quickly Wins Favor of Reading Public

Readers Show Appreciation of Its Greater Legibility in Letters to Papers Adopting It as Text Face

Optometrists Are Also Enthusiastic

Say New Face Will Play Large Part in Campaign for Conserving Eyesight

"Permit me to offer my sincere congratulations to the 'News' for the new type used on its pages. When I picked up the paper the improvement was so noticeable as to be almost startling. The improved type surely must be of great benefit to the eyes of the 'News' readers."

Thus Mrs. J. H. Troutman of Denver, Colo., registered her approval of the new dress of the "Rocky Mountain News" when that publication first appeared in Ionic No. 5. The letter is typical of many others that have been received by papers that have adopted the new Linotype text face. Even more interesting than Mrs. Troutman's letter is the one sent to the "Philadelphia Record" by Charles F. Bower, 82 years old, who has been a reader of the "Record" since its first issue, nearly 57 years ago. Mr. Bower said, in part:

"Of late I have been afraid I would soon have to give up my reading for fear I should go blind. The thought of having to depend upon some one else for the news was most distressing. The good old 'Record' came to my rescue just in time. With the new type I am sure I am good for several years more of newspaper reading.

"I find the new style type can be read with ease, but this isn't the only advantage I have noticed. It also reduces strain and relieves fatigue and adds materially to pleasure. In fact, the new dress of 'The Record' invites reading. Its even tone is restful to the eyes, but not monotonous."

Eye Specialists Acclaim Ionic

A great number of the congratulatory letters reaching the offices of Ionic users are from eye specialists, oculists and optometrists, and all of them chorus in their praise of Ionic's legibility. A typical example is the letter of Charles D. Waugh, president of the Wisconsin

Good Balance Is An Essential Part Of Good Make-up

Brings Together Unrelated Units and Forms them Into Unified Design; Also Helps Hold Reader's Eye on Page

The importance of the part good balance plays in the achievement of good make-up is demonstrated in each new day's output of newspapers, and is emphasized in the displays at editorial association contests. Almost invariably the balanced page presents a far more pleasing appearance than its helter-skelter contemporary.

This does not mean that perfect balance, or symmetry, is absolutely essential. Quite the contrary, for as much can be done with a dissymmetrical layout as with one in which every item on one side of the page is countered with an item of equal length on the opposite side. Care must be exercised in dissymmetrical make-up, however, to avoid a feeling of one-sidedness, and here the matter of balance again comes into play. Items

Modern Reading Habits Necessitate the Use of Clean Cut, Readable Letters for the Head Dress

Present Day Reader A Headline Scanner

He Has Little Patience with Newspapers That Make Reading More Difficult

That a change has come about in the reading habits of the newspaper buyer is generally acknowledged by those persons who have investigated the psychological side of publishing. For example, Grant Milnor Hyde, in his book "Newspaper Editing," says, "Ease of reading has become so important that 'Easy to Read' has already appeared as a newspaper slogan. All but the most conservative of journals have accepted the idea that their pages must be easy to read. In making this decision they acknowledge that they are catering to the casual reader rather than the thoughtful reader. They are admitting that the man who will wade through an unattractive newspaper is fast becoming extinct."

This situation explains the necessity of giving attention to legibility and attractiveness in the selection of a type dress, a fact recognized by Norman J. Radder when he wrote, in "Newspaper Make-up and Headlines," "Until a few years ago little thought was given to the readability of headline type. The chief concern seemed to be to get a condensed or extra-condensed face that would carry the largest posssible number of units to the line. The result was that some papers used headlines that were so condensed that complaints were made by the readers."

Also Applies to Body Type

Mr. Radder agrees with other authorities that the same condition holds true of body types. He says, "The selection of the body type deserves as much care as the selection of the headline type. Many papers have faces exceedingly light in weight and with no character that makes for easy reading. The mind cannot absorb what the eye does not see, and consequently if a paper is not easy to read, or if the character of the type is poor,

Linotype Bodoni Bold Unusually Practical As Head Letter Face

Is Black Enough to Give Good Display While Its Familiar Forms Make It a Very Readable Face

Good Letter Count Among Advantages

Attractiveness Combines with Utility in Making It a Desirable Letter for Newspaper Composition

Bodoni Bold on Linotype matrices follows, in general characteristics, the original face designed by Giambattista Bodoni, Printer of Parma in the early part of the Nineteenth Century. In so doing it retains the features which that master printer sought to give his type, the chief among them being what he termed "classic simplicity."

Bodoni Bold is heavy enough to replace Gothic types, but in beauty of design and legibility it attains a far greater attractiveness than will ever be found in block letters. The sharp contrast between its major and minor lines makes it infinitely more pleasing than the serif-less Gothic faces.

This same characteristic is accountable for Bodoni Bold's readability, and enables its being closely spaced, a consideration of advantage to the head writer because it endows Bodoni Bold with a good letter count. Even more practical in this latter respect, however, is the new Bodoni Bold Condensed, a face cut especially for use in newspaper heads. It combines the characteristics of the Bodoni family with a usable slimness."

Available in Wide Size Range

Another of Bodoni Bold's attributes as a newspaper face is the wide size range in which it is available on the Linotype. The roman runs from six to thirty-six point and the italic may be had in sizes from six to thirty point. This permits the preparation of a varied head schedule set completely in Bodoni Bold, with Bodoni Bold Condensed, Bodoni and Bodoni Book available as supplementary faces.

Ionic and Bodoni Bold Interesting in Boxes

Boxes, to attain their full purpose, must offer a definite contrast to the rest of the type matter with which they are surrounded. This does not involve the use of special fonts if care is taken in the preparation of the head schedule. Bodoni Bold Italic is an admirable head letter for boxes, for it is thoroughly legible, even in its smaller sizes, and harmonizes with the roman in splendid fashion. Ionic, eminently legible in straight composition, loses none of its readability when it is leaded. The attractive effect these two faces achieve in combination is here exemplified.

Paper Using Ionic Receives Praise of Noted Psychologist

Points Out Ease with Which It Is Possible to Recognize Letter and Word Forms in This New Linotype Face

When the "Philadelphia Record" first came out in its new Ionic dress a number of its readers quickly acclaimed the improvement. Among them was Dr. Thaddeus L. Bolton, psychologist, who wrote:

"The appearance of this new type in the 'Philadelphia Record' shows at once several advantages over type face previously used. The page makes at first sight a much better appearance and is much more pleasing to the eye. The difference thus noted is due to several things. The letters have heavier lines in a majority of their parts. The width of the letters is greater than in the older type.

"Here are two factors of importance. The dark line is more easily fixated. The greater width of the letters makes the letters more readily recognized. Reading

HEADLINE after headline issues from the Linotype, each in column width when wanted, or each in a different measure if the need demands. All of them may be in the same face and size, or each in a different face and size—it is of little consequence to the Linotype. Headlines and body matter issue from it in a steady run, one full line with each revolution of its cams.

The economies which obviously result from such flexible, continuous composition, coupled with the legibility of Linotype faces, account for The Distinguished Newspaper's adoption of Linotype methods. It is through them that The Distinguished Newspaper can be "printed so he who runs may read" at a definite saving over ordinary production methods.

DAILY'S "I PREDICT" CONTEST TESTED READERS' ABILITY TO THINK

Answers Reveal Average Man Substitutes Hope for Intelligence in His Reasoning—Enjoys "Wise-Cracking" —10 Per Cent Average 90 in Test

By STRATFORD CORBETT

HOW much does the average newspaper reader understand of what he reads? Has he wit? Discernment? Intelligence?

These and other interesting questions were answered in a practical way recently when some thousand or more readers of the Brooklyn Daily Eagle participated in an "I Predict" prize contest which that paper sponsored. Each day for two weeks the Eagle printed a set of ten doubtful predictions about the next day's news, and it was the business of contestants to indicate the probable outcome of the events listed and to give a reason for each choice.

The tentative predictions covered everything from Lindbergh's flight and England's diplomatic break with Russia to such comparatively unimportant matters as the day's ball game. Also included regularly in the day's set were observations on the stock market, the weather, and actions of well-known persons.

Of course, no one of these predictions could be checked without some study of the news and without some thought on the part of the readers.

But can newspaper readers think?

From the thousands of answers received highly interesting conclusions have been drawn. For one thing, not a few readers, it was discovered, find it difficult to distinguish between what they would like to happen and what, according to the available facts, is most likely to occur. The Governor of Massachusetts, for example, was generally predicted to take immediate action in the Sacco-Vanzetti case "because the men are innocent," "because they should be freed" and "because they are poor foreigners," but this reasoning ignored the amazing amount of data the governor was obliged to examine and the probability that such a decision could not be made over-night.

A similar example is that of the reader who hopefully predicted that Babe Ruth will hit a home run tomorrow "because I'm going to see him do it."

The same false thinking was evidenced in other instances both with and without an obvious emotional stimulus. On certain stock market predictions readers answered that the stock in question would rise "because it is a good firm" or "because the car they manufacture is a good car." Of course, here again the real facts to be considered are the conditions controlling the market at the time.

Another evidence of false reasoning noted was the temptation of readers to make clever retorts at the sacrifice of truth. Byrd will not fly tomorrow "because he is not a fly Byrd," the total number of marriages performed at City Hall Chapel will be 12 "because the marriage clerks must have their daily dozen" are fair examples of this type.

Then there was the girl who would always foretell the weather by referring to her window cleaner. "It will rain tomorrow," she would write, "because my window cleaner showed up today," or "it will be clear because the window cleaner hasn't been around today." It is amusing to note that she was as often right as those using more scientific methods.

In general, however, readers exhibited rather shrewd thinking. Of one thousand replies 10 per cent rated 90 or more, 15 per cent rated over 80, and 20 per cent rated over 60. This according to psychologists (Prof. Eliott Sharp of Wisconsin), is really a very high average.

A few of one day's questions which called for Yes or No answers, and the answers follow:

"I predict that during the 24 hours ending at noon, May 19:

"1. Ruth Snyder will issue public statement asking sympathy. No, because the public is against her.

"2. Manicurists will abandon strike and return to work in Bronx. Yes, because they have no money at hand.

"3. Coolidge will call special session for flood relief. No, because he will later on.

"4. Robins will shut out Chicago Cubs. No, because the Cubs are heavy batters.

"5. McAdoo will make an open move for Democratic nomination. No, because he will gain more by waiting."

THREE WRITERS START A REALTY BUSINESS

Trio of New York Daily News Reporters Buy and Remodel a Greenwich Village Tenement

Far from being merely the home of young, violent reds and parlor pinks, Greenwich Village, New York's artist colony, also numbers many a budding capitalist among its natives.

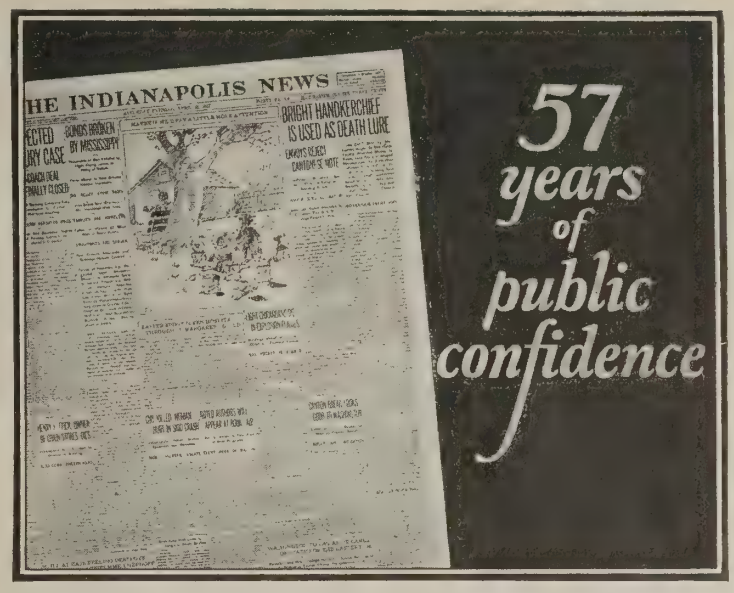
Three of these young capitalists are members of the staff of the New York Daily News. They have incorporated the Greenwich Village Company, with Ralph F. Armstrong, special writer, president; James Jemail, a photographer, treasurer; and Jean Vernon, reporter, secretary.

"We just decided that newspaper people ought to work for themselves one day a week," Miss Vernon explained this week. "We worked six days a week for the Daily News, and on the seventh day, Thursday, instead of resting, we visited pawn shops and mortgage brokers, until we raised enough money to buy something to own and run for ourselves.

The Greenwich Village Corporation owns an arty apartment house on 40 Horatio street. It is five stories high and has 20 one-room and bath apartments which rent for $40 to $50 a month. Each room has its own fireplace, and the bathrooms, a novelty in the Village, all have tiled floors and walls.

"We bought it on a shoe string," Miss Vernon confessed. "And we're only now beginning to get our rings out of hock.

"But its been lots of fun. You ought to have seen it when we first bought it, a regular old tenement house. We only paid $3,000 down, but we put $30,000 in on repairs. We could have sold it a little while ago for $10,000 profit."



It is the idea behind the Greenwich Village Improvement Company, that Miss Vernon desired to stress. It's an investment for its owners. She thinks that newspaper people are inclined to think too much about today and not enough about tomorrow.

"I know I don't want to end up in an old ladies' home," said Miss Vernon.

TO BOOM ANTHRACITE

Newspapers of Coal Region Urge Fight to Regain Lost Markets

Most of the newspapers in the Scranton and Wilkes-Barre fields in Pennsylvania are now supporting the idea of booming anthracite coal. The journals say everyone in the anthracite counties should boost the sale of hard coal with the idea of reclaiming former markets for this fuel and insure steady work at the mines. The "boost anthracite" idea originated with the Pottsville (Pa.) Journal and has been taken up by larger papers in the field. Some of these journals intimate that in the near future the antnracite operators intend to launch an extensive advertising campaign in coal buying fields with the idea of increasing the market for hard coal.

RED HOT STYLE IN BASEBALL WRITING KNOCKED FOR A "ROW OF HASSOCKS"

All Those Sad Young Men Behind the Grandstand Netting Discarding Shrill Slang of Former Years, Says Nunnally Johnson—Players Don't "Tap the Apple" Any More

The gaudy baseball jargon of the sports pages is simmering down to understandable English, Nunnally Johnson, a special writer for the New York Evening Post, observed in a recent feature article. His comparison of the old and new types of baseball reporting follows:

IN common with other forms of human endeavor, newspaper reports of baseball games, which not so long ago were written in a practically incomprehensible argot, have developed during the past few years to a point where they stand unabased in the presence of the scholar.

If, now, Babe Ruth knocks a home run, it appears in the accounts that he knocked a home run. It was not always that simple. Once the ecstatic chronicler would have set it down on paper that "The Bustling Bambalina of Bam crashed the pellet for a complete series of hassocks," and whosoever read this and found it annoying if not mystifying would simply have to chase himself.

The contention was that this type of writing was colorful. It gave or added zest to the story. It gave it bounce and spirit and excitement. It may have, but the notion never sank very deeply into the beliefs of more soundly established baseball writers. They went right on saying that this sporting gentleman or that sporting gentleman had made a home run, or, on particularly festive occasions, a circuit clout, which was understandable.

But high-spirited young men drafted from impecunious positions, on the belief that the writing of baseball did not call for any extraordinary literary talent, began bounding into the sporting pages with a solid conviction that they were being offered an opportunity not to report a baseball game but to see what they could do with the English language, or, anyway, with that part of it with which they had any familiarity, which usually wasn't much of a part.

While the Messrs. Hanna, Lieb, Vila and other proficient veterans were endeavoring to bring a record of the game clearly and as vividly as they could these agile young men were succeeding pretty thoroughly in an apparent effort to reduce the facts to mystery.

There was to them no ball player simply named "John Smith." He became at once "Spitting Jackie Smith, the moist-ball moundsman of the Huggins Howitzers." Hal Chase didn't play first base; he was "the guardian of the initial hassock." Eddie Collins covered "the keystone hassock." Devlin on third base was "keeper of the hot corner," or, when a reporter burst into a matchless spasm of originality, "the denizen of the torrid angle."

A pitcher was a "moundsman." The batter "bingled," "tapped the apple for a duo, a trio or a quartet of stations." The "moundsman" "flipped" with his "fork hand." There was a "wind-pad artist" behind "the old platter." An "outer gardener" covered the "dexter field."

When a lad got down into an account of a baseball game with these terms at hand he began to lather and froth at the mouth in the mental strain of producing still further and more opaque descriptions. He would die, apparently, rather than submit to the shame of referring to a baseball as a baseball. It was a "pellet," a "pill," an "apple" or "the horsehide." As a newspaper man himself at the time, this reporter stood around more than once in gasps of admiration before some young mastermind who had devised a new and completely obscure synonym for umpire, to alternate with "umps" and "arbiter" and "holder of the indicator."

He has, however, been present as eyewitness when one resourceful young "scribe" broke the proud news to a flabbergasted group that in his previous day's story he had described an inning as a "Chapter." This reporter has never seen the pride of fatherhood shine more brightly than it did on that occasion. It was, it seemed, just a stroke of genius, which he could not describe at all, even when pressed by his awed fellows. Those things, it appeared, happened—and that was all one could say in explanation.

For some reason these young men have not lasted in their callings. They may find places on those newspapers whose headlines are still full of "ban," "jam," "grid," "flays" and other familiar terms, but the sight of constant readers biting their nails in desperation each evening as they tried to get to the meat of the business at the Polo Grounds that afternoon went finally straight to the publishers' hearts and presently the neophyte H. C. Witwers were back rushing copy paper about the office or otherwise engaged in professions more adaptable to their talents. The Messrs. Hanna, Lieb, Vila, et. al., continued placidly at their business of accounting for the game, in language which fell softly and beautifully upon the reader's ear and eye.

A survey of six reports of a recent game uncovered no more than seven of the ragged expressions of that gaudy period, and even some of these were open to question. A circuit clout, a spitballer, a short-field man, and such remnants are probably legitimate. The variety sought by the passé generation of baseball reporters was a variety apparently necessary only to young men who sought to conceal a monotony of expression. Baseball writers more fitted to their profession had no need for it.

PLANNING NEW DAILY

G. W. Purcell Will Launch Spencer (Ind.) Evening World, June 29

The Spencer (Ind.) Evening World will be launched Wednesday, June 29, by George W. Purcell, publisher of the Bloomington (Ind.) Evening World, it was announced this week.

The paper will be the first daily in Owen County, and will be issued in conjunction with the Bloomington World. Four pages of Spencer news and advertising will be printed in Spencer with a small plant equipment, Mr. Purcell said.

H. Philip Maxwell, formerly with the Louisville (Ky) Courier-Journal, will be in charge at Spencer.

FORBES TAKES NEW POST

The White Plains (N. Y.) Building & Realty News has announced the appointment of Charles B. Forbes as publisher. He has been on the staffs of the New Orleans Times-Picayune, Knoxville Journal, Cincinnati Enquirer and Miami Daily News. He was editor of the Nashville Tennessean from 1920 to 1926. He is a brother of T. Harold Forbes, vice-president Westchester Newspapers, Inc., and publisher of the New Rochelle Standard-Star, and of George P. Forbes, publisher of the Mamaroneck Times and the Larchmont Times.

MOVE TO BAR WRITERS ENDS IN ILLINOIS

Resolutions to Keep Chicago Tribune Men from House Gallery Killed with Aid of Paper's Foes

Another victory was scored in the cause of freedom of the press when an attempt made in the Illinois House of Representatives to bar all correspondents of the Chicago Tribune from the press box, the floor of the house, and the galleries, failed in the face of opposition from a body that stands about 108 to 29 against the Tribune's anti-Small policy.

Representative Harry M. McCaskrin of Rock Island, the author of the resolution, withdrew it without putting it to a vote. It was the climax to a series of attacks Mr. McCaskrin has made upon the Tribune as the result of disbarment proceedings which were begun against him, alleging misconduct in the trial of John Looney of Rock Island, one of whose counsel he was. Mr. McCaskrin was cleared of the charges by the Supreme court.

Representatives Howard P. Castle and Thomas J. O'Grady both spoke in defense, not of The Tribune, with whose policies they declared they frequently disagreed, but of the right of all the press to attend and report as they saw them the proceedings of the legislature.

"To adopt this resolution would be to make ourselves ridiculous," Mr. Castle declared.

"The Tribune has never supported me," said Mr. O'Grady, "but it is their right to disagree if they see fit."

Representative Michael L. Igoe, minority leader, after first securing a retraction of an insinuation that those who spoke against the resolution were the mouthpieces of the Tribune, moved to lay the resolution on the table, but McCaskrin withdrew it instead.

If You Have Colors Sail Under Them!

IN THE course of a discussion on the merits of rotogravure printing, with especial reference to its adaptation to color, an eminent authority has this to say about THE WORLD'S COLOR GRAVURE SECTION.

"The progress made by the New York World in the last few months is certainly encouraging. Their recent reproduction of the Camel Cigarette ad was not only very well printed but was a comparatively faithful reproduction of the original copy." —Charles F. Hart, Mechanical Superintendent, New York Times

In providing a medium by which the advertiser can distribute weekly more than 600,000 faithful reproductions of his package in its true colors, has simplified to a marked degree the task of introducing a new product, or familiarizing the consumer with an old one, in the richest retail market America offers.

"NO PREMIUM" POLICY BUILDS BETTER READERSHIP

FIFTH GREATEST MARKET IS FIRST IN BALANCED SALES

L. A. EXAMINER LEADS FIELD AT HIGH PRICE

WHEN it comes to buying newspapers in Los Angeles, the reading public is interested neither in cheapness, nor $1.98 maps thrown in to make the paper look like your money's worth.

People in Los Angeles have, in the morning field, three newspapers to choose from. Both are substantially cheaper than The Examiner. One actually uses that as an argument in soliciting additional circulation while setting itself up to advertisers as the great "class" medium of this territory.

But still more people pay more money to read The Los Angeles Examiner than pay any price to read any other morning and Sunday newspaper West of the Missouri.

No Premiums

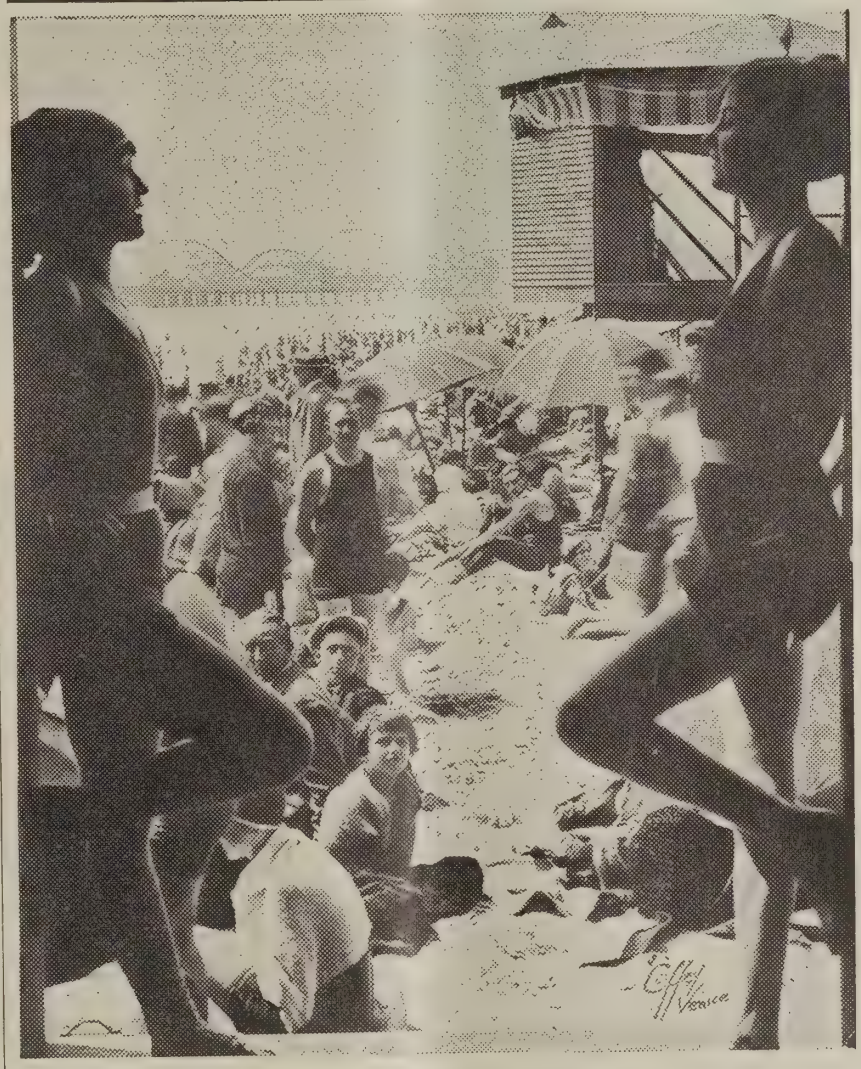
The Los Angeles Examiner, for the past nine years, has operated its circulation department in the belief that a good newspaper attracts readers automatically. It has not, in all that time, thrown in earmuffs, street-maps, opera glasses, thermos bottles, fountain pens, or anything else as a lure to get subscriptions.

Its readers have preferred to spend $1.05 a month to read it, than to pay a cheaper price for another paper, for a very obvious reason. They like The Examiner better, they can afford the difference, and in this well-to-do land of America, the quality appeal has a lot more potency than the appeal of cheapness.

Circulation managers, as well as advertising space buyers, will find a lot to think about in these facts. And another interesting thought for them is found in this: While it decries the value of street sales, one of our morning papers here spends about $1500 a week for newsboy bonuses in trying to get more of such sales; while The Examiner similarly invests about $330.

What's the answer? Well, it can be found in the literature of the EXCLUSIVE private college for young men which, while pointing out that its very smallness indicates its class, is striving night and day to become as large as the largest!

Merchandise Department Aids Largest Companies



NO manufacturer doing business in Los Angeles is so big that The Examiner's Merchandising Service Department cannot do him additional good. The Pacific Coast Biscuit Company's recent experience is a good indication of that.

With an enviable record in distribution, good will and sales volume, this company, through D. M. Hirsch, sales manager, wrote to The Examiner, under date of May 20th, following reports from the service department on Honeymaid Graham Crackers:

"Please accept our thanks for the reports of the Honeymaid Graham survey that your boys are doing, and wish to advise that we have secured very good leads from this list.

"We have already sold the Cornwell Grocery at 7211 South Broadway and have a very good chance of securing two other accounts appearing on this list."

The Atlantic City of the West!

92% of Failures in L. A. Among Non-Advertisers

NINETY-TWO per cent of the failures in Los Angeles since the first of 1927, were non-advertisers!

Those are the interesting figures revealed recently, following a careful check through the Federal Bankruptcy courts in this city.

The average percentage of failures made by non-advertisers in thirty-two cities of the United States, is 83.6, indicating that in the Los Angeles field it is perhaps a trifle more necessary to business success to meet competition with competition, to declare one's self to newcoming population, and to hold old friends, while making new.

Of thirty-two principal cities surveyed recently in this conection, Bridgeport, Connecticut, and Nashville, Tennessee, showed the lowest non-advertising mortality rate, with 60 and 67 per cent respectively, while Troy, New York, was highest with 100 per cent.

42 New Factories in L. A. in 4 Months

FORTY-TWO new factory and industrial projects have entered the Los Angeles manufacturing district since the beginning of 1927, according to figures just given out by the Los Angeles Chamber of Commerce.

These forty-two, added to the existing 5,700, will represent an expenditure of $36,000,000, will give employment to more than 7,500 persons and will pour out to these workers in the form of payroll more than $10,000,000 a year.

Included in this list are B. F. Goodrich Rubber Company, Sears, Roebuck & Company, Ford Motor Car Company, American Can Company, Illinois Pacific Glass Corporation, Truscon Steel, California Compress & Warehouse Company and similar organizations of national and international scope and reputation.

JUNE, JULY, AUGUST BIG MONTHS IN L. A.

WITH from 4,500 to 6,000 people flocking into Los Angeles daily for their summer vacations, business is taking its annual summer jump in this city while, in other great markets throughout the nation, manufacturers, weather with a scowl.

The fifth largest market in America, rated as first in the world in balanced all-year sales, knows no seasons, therefore no let-ups or let-downs in buying inclinations. Only, in summer time, the trend is always upward, what with hundreds of thousands streaming in here, bringing their money with them, and spending it, as vacationists always do, for just about everything in sight.

There probably isn't another large market in the world so fortunately situated as Los Angeles, insofar as balance of buying is concerned. Her eggs are in a dozen baskets, and there are eggs for every month.

Like Great Magnet

During the summer months, for instance, Los Angeles County, which is the richest agricultural county anywhere, is rushing endless trainloads of deciduous fruits and grapes to market; during the summer months, oil gushes every hour of every day from the entrails of the earth and enriches thousands of people. Millions of dollars are fed into local, statewide and national channels annually and all summer by the diversified manufacturing interests which have set up here. Motion pictures, for instance, know no season, but are being marketed and shown throughout the world every day, and most of them come out of Los Angeles!

Like a gigantic magnet, the beautiful summer climate of this city, draws from throughout the nation, a vast group of pleasure seekers and liberal spenders, alert for new things, new modes, new ideas, new merchandise to take home with them.

Bank clearings last summer were more than $89,000,000 over the clearings of the winter previous! And winter includes Christmas clearings!

Tell it in Los Angeles, and you'll sell it in Los Angeles, twelve months out of every twelve!

ONE FACT WORTH A MILLION FANCIES IN DETERMINING VALUE OF FEATURES

That Is Opinion of Louis Weitzenkorn, Sunday Editor, New York World, Who Describes Difficulties of Dealing with Free-Lance Writers—Wants Social Life Reported

By PHILIP SCHUYLER

"PARDON me," Louis Weitzenkorn asked, and swung about in his chair to answer the telephone, the bell of which had been ringing persistently for the last several seconds.

It was impossible to avoid overhearing one-half of the ensuing conversation, the half spoken by the Sunday editor of the New York World. It was impossible likewise to miss the moral of the message he gave to the unseen person at the other end of the line; and since this all happened to be on an entirely professional subject there can be no impropriety in repeating what was heard.

"It sounds," Mr. Weitzenkorn observed into the telephone at first, "like a darn good little feature."

There followed a minute or two of silence, that golden silence during which marvelous embroidery can be done.

"Um," resumed the editor at the end of it, "How do you know that's true? . . . It sounds a little press agenty to me. . . . A little too good. . . . Who told you? . . . Did you check on it? . . . Are you sure of your facts? . . . You know people don't fall for that kind of stuff any more. . . . If it's a fact. . . . It isn't. . . . No, we won't use it. . . . Thank you, good-bye."

The receiver clicked back on its hook and the moral which clicked to mind in unison was:

"One fact is worth ten million fancies."

It summed up succinctly the interview with Mr. Weitzenkorn, which was on the subject, "What makes up a good Sunday newspaper feature?" A true story, based on the news, was the short definition given by the World's Sunday editor.

Hundreds of free-lance writers in New York are attempting to furnish the Sunday newspapers with feature stories, Mr. Weitzenkorn said. He doesn't object to the large number. He thinks it important that there are so many.

"It is a good thing to have competition," he said. "Only the best survive.

"But dealing with the free lance is one of the difficulties of the job of Sunday editor. Unlike reporters, they are frequently not trained to hunt down a story to its source, nor have they the desire to. They are apt to believe everything they are told, whereas the skeptical reporter takes nothing for granted. If a man says his name is John Smith and he lives at such and such an address, the free lance very frequently will let it go at that, while the reporter will check the name with the address.

"Then there is the tendency of the untrained, unscrupulous or super-imaginative to embroider a story. So many would-be writers forget the bromide that truth is stranger than fiction.

Louis Weitzenkorn

"To please the readers of a modern American newspaper, the writer need not stretch a single fact. No fiction writer could tell a story of a trans-Atlantic flight which would compare with the actual account of Lindbergh's achievement.

"The public has been fed to discomfiture with the guff of the press agent. They no longer fall for fakes, and, in consequence, even the press agents are reforming. Recruited from the ranks of modern newspaper men, the men writing publicity today know they must stick to facts and facts only. The best newspaper men today hate fakery.

"Columnists who depend solely upon their imagination never succeed like those who work with specific facts, who write of definite people and known places.

"It is my belief that the true story idea has lodged itself for a long stay in the public fancy. It seems to me that more biography is being read today and more history. People are looking facts in the face and, far from being shocked, are enjoying the meeting. Just to mention a few of the currently popular books, for example, 'The Microbe Hunters'; 'Story of Philosophy'; 'Rise of American Civilization'; 'Revolt in the Desert'; Woodward's 'Life of Washington,' and Sandberg's 'Life of Lincoln.'"

Mr. Weitzenkorn in giving his opinion of what makes a good Sunday feature story, had thus described a story that was true, but first of all, he said, it must be based on the news.

"'Is it news?'" he said, "is really the most important yardstick in determining the value of a Sunday feature story. News is one element that is absolutely essential.

"A feature may also be the development of a specific news story into a generality. Such a story, for instance, as a study of the psychology of criminals, which follows a series of specific crimes in the news.

"Not to be overlooked is the news of current ideas, the latest question and answer craze, the games people play, the way the hostess of today entertains. In other words, the social life of the town or city, whether it be written satirically by a Milt Gross, or set down seriously by reporters.

"There is no getting around the fact that people are interested in other people and what they are doing. The best Sunday feature story I've seen for many a day was written about a year ago by Miss Beatrice Blackmar, now a member of our staff.

"She was free-lancing at the time. At the suggestion of W. P. Beazell, assistant managing editor, she went to a walk-up apartment and interviewed 12 New York housewives, finding out what they were doing, what life meant to them, in the metropolis, what they hoped to do, whether they longed for the more neighborly life of the small city, what they liked and disliked. The news element in the resulting story was that Miss Blackmar reported on life as it is today.

"You can end the story by saying:

"'She got the job.'"

Gentlemen:

Your representative made the claim that the Ludlow System would enable our composing room to give our advertisers better service, and would so improve the typography of our ads as to help my department sell more advertising — and it has done that, and more.

All members of the Call's advertising staff are loud in their praise of the improved typographical appearance of Call advertising wherein Ludlow composition is used.

We installed the complete Ludlow System early in 1926 and the greatly improved appearance of both advertising columns and news pages has fully justified all of our hopes from this investment in modern typographical equipment.

BOSTON AMERICAN'S WEEKLY AD PRIZE CONTEST ROUSED WIDE N. E. INTEREST

All of Several Hundred Pieces of Copy Were for Local Firms—Standard of Copy Throughout Paper Raised by Contest

SO successful has been the result of the Prize Review of Current Advertising recently conducted by the Boston Evening American that the newspaper has been showered with congratulatory messages from national advertisers, advertising agencies, business men and educators all over the entire country, many of whom have requested full information concerning the contest and clippings of the winning advertisements. The messages are still pouring in although the contest closed three weeks ago.

Lux toilet soap copy which won prize in third week of Boston American local advertisers' contest.

The contest, which was in charge of H. James Gediman, of the American's department of research and promotion, ran six weeks. A committee of five prominent Greater Boston advertising men was chosen to select the best advertisement appearing in the American during the week, being judged upon certain qualifications. As an award the firm running the winning advertisement was presented a receipted bill for the advertisement in question. Each week several other advertisements were given honorable mention.

Winners in the competition follow:

First week, Paine Furniture Company; second week, J. P. Squire & Co.; third week, Lux Toilet Soap; fourth week, Continental Clothing Company; fifth week, Jordan Marsh Company and sixth week, Henshaw Motor Company.

Those receiving honorable mention were:

Hathaway's Gilt Edge Bread (three times); Procter & Gamble Co., Chipso (three); Gulden's Mustard (twice); Filene's (twice); Barking Dog Cigarettes (twice); Burt's Ground Gripper Shoes (twice); Jordan Marsh Company (twice); Penn the Florist (twice); First National Bank of Boston, Waterman's Fountain Pens, Squire's Arlington Ham, Fall River Line, Shepard Stores, Continental Clothing Company of Boston, Truly Warner, Post's Bran Flakes, Edison Shop, Loose, Wiles Biscuit Co., New England Telephone & Telegraph Company, Fisk Tire Company, Eastern Kodak Company, Boston Consolidated Gas Company and Liggett's Drug Stores.

The judges were: Allen H. Wood, president of Wood, Putnam & Wood Co., advertising agency, Boston; George G. Rorke, district superintendent, Dictaphone Sales Corporation, Boston; Ralph E. Conder, advertising manager Boston Woven Hose & Rubber Co., Cambridge; Floyd L. Miller, Barta Press, Cambridge; and Jacob S. Wichert, publicity manager Mellins Food Company, Boston.

The following basis of scoring was used by the judges:

General attention value, 20 per cent; (quality of typography 10 per cent and quality of illustration 10 per cent); interest and readability of statement 20 per cent; sincerity and convincingness 20 per cent; appropriateness of copy and layout to product advertised 10 per cent; appropriateness of copy to character and obvious business policy of advertiser 10 per cent; influence to action 10 per cent, and novelty or ingenuity of presentation 10 per cent; total 100 per cent.

In the opinion of many advertising men this contest was one of the most interesting run by any newspaper in the country. It was the first competition of its kind ever conducted by a Boston newspaper, if not in New England. It was conducted along lines similiar to that of the Bok Harvard Advertising awards contest.

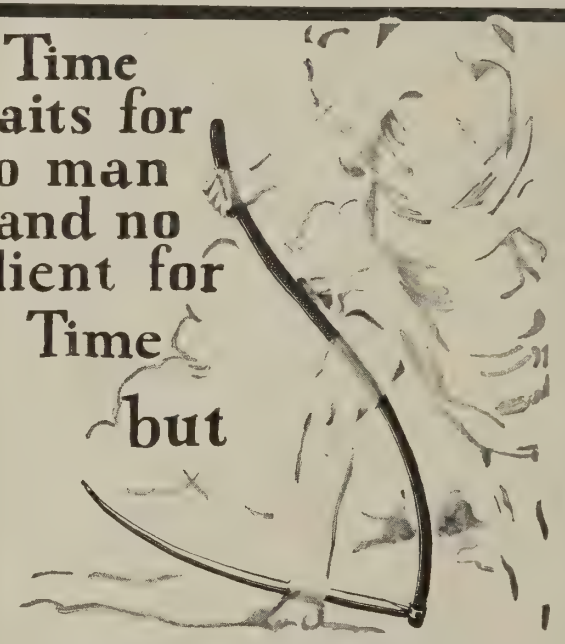
An interesting phase of the competition was that some of the winning advertisements were not prepared especially for the contest, but were written weeks before as part of regular advertising schedule without any special consideration of entering it in contest and scheduled for routine insertion. It came as a pleasant surprise to these firms when their advertisements were chosen for the award or given honorable mention. Several firms received honorable mention two or three times, while Jordan Marsh Company, a department store, won first prize the fifth week and also honorable mention two other weeks.

When the advertising writer of a certain national advertiser learned that an advertisement written by him had been given honorable mention, he immediately wrote a lengthy letter to the American explaining in detail how the advertisement had been planned, written, etc.

Of peculiar interest was the fact that of the hundreds of advertisements considered in the competition, all were of local advertisers, although the advertising of one of these firms, Lever Brothers, of Cambridge, Mass., advertising Lux toilet soap, is national in scope.

The winning advertisements at present are on exhibition at the rooms of the advertising Club of Boston, where they are being examined with much interest by Boston advertising men and others interested in the study of advertising.

"All in all we believe it to be the most worthwhile contest conducted in a number of years," declared Mr. Gediman, who had charge of the competition, in discussing it with a representative of EDITOR & PUBLISHER.



"While it was a contest, it carried with it none of the negative suggestions associated with that work. The purpose of good advertising is to make it so readable, helpful and informative that the reader gets value received for the time and attention spent in reading it.

"We feel that bad or even mediocre advertising reflects unfavorably upon the news columns of the paper. If an advertisement s good it increases the tone of the news columns. One of the best things that this competition may have done is to do away with the elements of hunch and guesswork as to what makes the good advertisements good. This is the first newspaper attempting such a contest.

"The judges noticed that on the whole the advertisements considered seemed to be more carefully planned than usual. The judges pointed out that in the field of cigarette advertising, which used to be purely a matter of exploitation, it is now getting down to the selling style of copy. Theatrical advertising also was found to be better than in past years. Its purpose has been to promote a better consciousness, the elements of persuasion, improved typography and illustration, and make one advertisement better than another."

EXPERTS ENDORSE THE NEW INTERTYPE IDEAL NEWS FACE USED IN THE NEW YORK TIMES

(Reprinted from The Times, June 8, 1927)

THE TIMES'S NEW TYPE

LARGER FACE WILL AID IN CONSERVATION OF EYESIGHT

The New York Times is certainly to be commended for adopting a larger and more legible type.

There can be no doubt that much eye trouble is due in part, to the burden placed upon the eye in the reading of small and illegible print.

There is, possibly, no class of laymen who can do more to conserve the vision of the nation than the publishers of newspapers, by employing the largest and most legible type practicable, by good presswork and by using the proper grade of paper.

Good presswork and a good grade of paper are both characteristic of The Times and are factors equal in importance with size of type and have much to do with legibility. The larger type now adopted by The Times is a marked improvement and will mean much to the eyes of your readers. According to the writer's recollection it was less than two years ago that you made a change in the face of type you used which increased legibility and the new face now adopted is a decided improvement and serves to indicate a most commendable consciousness on the part of The Times of its recognition of the vital importance of the conservation of vision.

CRUSADING NEWSPAPERS

CRITICS of the modern daily press delight in asserting that the old crusading spirit is dead and that the average editor would not, in these decadent days, turn his hand over to aid any public cause if the enterprise involved controversy or possible offense to special interests or advertisers. Yet, week by week EDITOR & PUBLISHER relates the circumstances of successful newspaper crusades in many cities and for good old familiar objects.

Last week two splendid victories for the people, wrought by spirited newspapers, were recorded. At Worcester, Mass., John H. Fahey, distinguished publisher of the Post, saw a year's editorial campaign for a reduction in electric power rates crowned with victory. The newspaper not only demonstrated that the rates of the local power company were too high but Mr. Fahey caused to be circulated popular petitions addressed to the Massachusetts Department of Public Utilities. So urgent was the demand and so conclusive the evidence that a favorable decision was obtained, the result being that the people of Worcester will have electricty for 5 cents, instead of 7 cents, meaning a saving to them of more than a half million dollars per annum. The Post's campaign led some 20 other companies in other Massachusetts communities to cut their rates.

At Houston, Tex., the Press scored a remarkable triumph for the people in the matter of a fair price for natural gas. M. E. Foster, editor of the Press, led the fight against increased gas rates which, he charged, would yield a gross profit to the utility company of 250 per cent. The proposed increase meant a tax of $360,000 on the householders of the city. The Houston city council had railroaded increased rates through three readings and the Mayor felt himself committed, but Mr. Foster raised such hob in first-page editorials that the politicians and service company officials took fright and surrendered, whipped to a standstill. Continuation of the old rates means a saving of $22 on the gas bill of the average citizen.

Much is said of the "silenced and servile American press," but there are ample proofs that honest, conscientious and intelligent editorship is still in the saddle in many cities, serving the people of the town and making sacrifices when they are necessary.

Now that the birdmen have received their just dues on page one, let American thought return to the monstrous fact that the Mississippi has made 600,000 Americans homeless and miserable, that the South is calling for an immediate session of Congress and a relief appropriation of from $100,000,000 to $300,000,000, and that the flood problem has not been solved for the future.

MELLETT'S VICTORY

NEXT month Lengel, the former chief of police of Canton, will go on trial charged with first degree murder in the conspiracy to assassinate Don R. Mellett, editor of Canton Daily News. Four of the conspirators have been convicted, three receiving life sentences and one, who turned state's evidence, a sentence of from five to twenty years. If Lengel is convicted indictments of "higher up" conspirators are expected.

The almost unbelievable charges that Don Mellett printed in his newspaper of an alliance between the underworld and grafting officials of the local government have been sustained in the long test of the question in the local courts, but all has not yet been told. The monstrous condition did exist. Local respectability would have shut its eyes and let the thing go on; some nice people in Canton said that Mellett was "blackening the fair name of our city" and would have him gloss the vile mess.

We have never believed that Canton was more black than many other industrial cities in this dangerous era of bootlegging and audacious grafting, but Mellett was a red-blooded editor who was willing to risk himself to promote the true interests of the people of his community. His martyrdom has already brought to Canton rich fruits. The cancerous growth was attacked and the result is the general belief that Canton is now a safe place in which to live and work.

And he dreamed, and behold a ladder set up on the earth, and the top of it reached to heaven: and behold the angels of God ascending and descending on it.—Genesis, XXVIII; 12.

SCHOOL NEWS

IT remains our belief that the public school is one of the choicest assignments that may be written on a city editor's assignment sheet. A good school story interests a large per cent of the local population and is of high civic value. To act as mentor and defender of the youth of the community is a natural press function.

While occasionally we see a newspaper that appears to sense this opportunity and this responsibility, it is true, as we have often remarked, that the school assignment is ignored or slighted in many offices—at least is regarded as dull routine.

During June some 30,000,000 American boys and girls are required to give written proof of their ability to pass to higher grades in the public schools or to graduate. It is a severe mental test. Egged on by parents, brothers and sisters and particularly by teachers the children accept the challenge, but with such bated breath and such fluttering heart as perhaps only the tenderest of mothers and fathers may know. To the pupils, examination week is an occasion of grave import. Failure in this test means not only loss of time but humiliation and actual suffering for sensitive types. Examination week in any public school is a great human interest story for any newspaper man who will dig into it.

By chance we have come into possession of the regents' geography examination for the 8th grade in the grammar schools of New York State, conducted last Monday. In some respects it is a remarkable document. It contains some questions that to us seem unfair to a child of 11 to 15 years of age. We think it is a story. Here are three questions, each requiring a definite answer, which this examination paper contains: (1) "What is the lowest (coldest) temperature ever reached in your town or city?" (2) "What is the approximate altitude of the place where you live?" (3) "Congo is a ——— located in ———."

Can the reader of this paper answer off-hand the first question? "Ever" is a long time. It includes the Ice Age. That question is ambiguous, loose and unfair, in our opinion. If the child were asked to name the coldest day in his memory in that town he would have a chance to make a sensible reply. The "approximate altitude" of cities or towns that may be built both on hills and at sea level is another absurdity. "The place where you live," may mean your home, town, county, state or nation. If the question concerned the altitude of the land on which the school stands it could be answered. The correct answer to the Congo question is a river in Africa, but equally true would be a colony in Africa.

These are but a few specimens of tricky or loose questions in a public school examination upon which the fate of thousands of youngsters hung last Monday. The subject deserves newspaper exploitation. Indeed, if the geography test in New York State is a criterion of what school children in general are experiencing, the whole subject of examination methods is valid copy and we can think of nothing better for summer discussion. The suggestion is offered that city editors obtain copies of local examination papers and search them for unfair, tricky questions.

Next fall, when the schools reopen, declare your newspaper in on the tremendous local interest in public schools, assigning the best reporter on the staff to the task! The social side of school life, so often the only newspaper treatment the subject receives, is trivial and uninteresting, but the intricacies of public education offer wide fields to explore.

CONTROL OF BUNK TRAFFIC

THE editor of a Southern newspaper told us the other day how he handles the deluge of free publicity. We pass his interesting method to other editors: "All incoming letter mail is sorted in the general office, and only mail known to contain legitimate news matter, or advertising or circulation correspondence, goes to the several departments. All other letter mail and third class mail, with all package mail and mats not clearly intended for the advertising department, goes directly to a wise and not over-sympathetic young woman with a wholesome sense of humor, who, as secretary to the chief, has delegated authority equal to his.

"For a few minutes, at intervals, she operates two large steel cans. Into the cans goes every particle of 'publicity' except a few sheets which she thriftily tears up for scratch paper, an occasional actress saved for the sport editor to comfort him while his wife is away, and certain inclosures saved for the glance of an assistant editor who rarely opens the envelopes.

"Otherwise, not one piece in a thousand of this junk ever gets by her, except to fall into the janitor's sack on the way to the incinerator. Editors, departmental editors, advertising men, all are spared from having their desks cluttered up with it, and the newspaper is preserved untainted.

"When I want scratch-paper, I call for moving picture publicity; those birds use a good grade of bond paper that takes ink as well as any kind of pencil; try it. If the other 2,000 newspapers will adopt our policy, the 'publicity' evil will quickly dispose of itself."

Lindy's modesty and his mother's common sense have "set a new vogue," according to one optimistic news writer.

GOOD LEGAL REFORM

CALIFORNIA has just hit upon an excellent legal reform. A new law makes a complainant in divorce proceedings responsible for fraudulent, faked charges. If, for instance, a man should charge his wife with an offense and fail to substantiate his allegations in court he would be subject to a suit for libel. The new law is, as well, a protection for the press. No newspaper could, of course, be held liable for the publication of a false charge which has been made a record of the court in a formal complaint. The American press, however, does not enjoy publishing charges against people which are false and unjust and any regulation which tends to reduce this hazard will receive hearty press support.

A musical and dramatic society, composed of members of the staff of the London "Times," on regular occasions produces standard comic operas or dramas written on journalistic themes, for amusement and charity.

NO SUMMER SLUMP HERE

WHAT lines of business are most active in the Summer months? It is important to know if any newspaper's advertising staff is intelligently to resist the usual linage slump. The following departments of trade have their actual peaks of business in June, July, August and September: Canvas footwear, automobile tires, life insurance, plumbing and heating equipment, automotive equipment, roofing materials, lumber, motor trucks, building materials, stoves and ranges, petroleum, creams and ices, dental supplies, wearing apparel, biscuits, automobiles, brushes, school supplies, electric wire and furnaces, optical goods, portable typewriters, machinery, paint, toilet goods, and trunks and bags.

These statistics, for which we are indebted to the Dartnell Corporation, indicate plenty of room for advertising men to work profitably in during the Summer. It is not to be supposed, of course, that the articles mentioned have their peak sale in all localities in the four Summer months, but the averages are for the whole country. Local merchants if consulted on the subject, might be surprised to find just what are their best selling Summer lines. An inquiry might stir interest and advertising.

WOMEN IN ADVERTISING AND JOURNALISM

Hilma K. Benson in Charge of Advertising on Father's Paper—Mr. Berg Wins $4,000 Award in Damage Suit—Editor's Daughter Gets Post on Student Daily

MRS. HILMA K. BENSON, advertising manager of the Chicago Svenska Kuriren (Swedish Courier), thought it "a huge joke" when her father, A. J. Johnson, publisher of the paper, asked her to come down to the office and learn something of the business side while the regular advertising manager was on a trip abroad.

But when she was "turned down" by the first prospective advertiser she called on, she dug in in earnest, and became a successful business woman.

She has been advertising manager of her father's paper now for seven years and finds great zest in her work. She also holds the title of vice-president of the Swedish Courier. Advertising women of Chicago have honored her with the presidency of the Women's Advertising Club and she is scheduled to give two addresses at the Denver convention of the International Advertising Association June 26-29.

Mrs. Benson's ambition, she says, is to have national advertisers realize the importance of the foreign language field "which has been more or less overlooked."

Marjorie Baker, formerly of the Buffalo Evening News staff, is now writing sports for the Buffalo Courier & Express.

Miss Agnes T. Martin, secretary to the assistant auditor of the Boston (Mass.) Post, was presented with a purse of gold June 4 by her associates and friends in honor of her approaching marriage to Thomas H. Lyons of Woburn, Mass.

Mrs. Astrid Berg, formerly a reporter for the Worcester (Mass.) Telegram, was awarded a verdict of $4,000 by a Worcester jury in her suit against the Worcester Consolidated Street Railway Company for injuries received in a trolley accident.

Miss Virginia Carrico, secretary-treasurer of the Harrison Company, photo-engravers, has been elected president of the Women's Advertising Club of St. Louis.

Miss Leah Frederick has taken a place in the women's department of the Springfield (O.) Daily News.

CLASSIFIED ADVERTISING

Home Work Schemes Are Decreasing B. B. B. Reports—Classified Managers Cooperated with Postoffice Officials—Cincinnati Enquirer Bars "Flat" Ads

THE campaign of vigorous investigation conducted by the Post Office Department has materially decreased the "Home Work" schemes offered through classified columns, according to a bulletin of the National Better Business Bureau issued this week. The National Bureau and local Bureaus have cooperated in driving these misleading advertisements from the classified pages.

Metropolitan newspapers were deluged with this type of "Help Wanted" copy, a considerable part of which had for its object the selling of "outfits" under the guise of offering opportunities to earn money in the home.

"It appears from some three to four hundred investigations wherein the sale of an outfit was involved that these concerns, while advertising under Help Wanted, had no actual employment to offer and no other real business than the sale of outfits," the bulletin states.

"Hundreds have voluntarily discontinued business to obviate the issuance of fraud orders by the Post Office Department.

"There is no method of estimating accurately the amount of money collected through these schemes, although Post Office inspectors have estimated $1,000,000 as the annual toll.

"At one time twenty-one companies advertising for women to gild cards were operated in New York City by means of classified advertising insertions similar to the following:

"'LADIES—We pay $1.00 hundred gilding greeting cards; opportunity for beginners; experience unnecessary; no selling; addressed envelope brings particulars.'"

"The applicant was required to send $1 for an outfit, which consisted of a cheap lettering brush, a few cards, and a sheet of printed instructions.

"This type of work is a difficult process calling for care, time and the skill which usually proceeds from long practice.

"During investigation it was learned that in four out of five instances the card company never hears again from an applicant after the outfit has been sent to her.

"One company, in business for six months, received $50,000 for outfits, refunded $7,000, paid expenses of $5,000, and enjoyed a clear profit of $38,000.

"No substantial market for such finished cards has been found."

The National Better Business Bureau and the Post Office Department have been greatly aided in these investigations by the vigilance of classified advertising managers of progressive newspapers, the bulletin said.

War on "stuffed-flat" advertising in the classified columns has been declared by the Cincinnati Enquirer and last week the column was cleaned of about 25 of these undesirable ads.

It was found on investigation that a certain class of dealers had been taking advantage of the Sunday Enquirer classified columns under the heading "Household Goods" to palm off practically unsalable goods which they could not dispose of from their stocks. Their scheme was to rent a vacant flat or a house and furnish it from top to bottom and advertise a sale through the use of telephone numbers.

This is the first time that any newspaper has attacked the "stuffed-flat" evil in Cincinnati, but several newspapers in Chicago, New York and other cities have carried on the crusade.

W. H. Hershey, manager of the classified department of the Enquirer, obtained the co-operation of the Cincinnati & Suburban Telephone Company after accumulating a collection of suspicious names, telephone numbers and addresses. The telephone company made investigations which disclosed that the telephones had been obtained as residence 'phones. They were placed on a business phone basis at once. The Enquirer has established the ruling that all this class of advertising must have the word "dealer" inserted, so as not to mislead the readers of the Enquirer classified columns.

The Utica (N. Y.) Daily Press recently carried a section devoted to a "Better Homes Exposition" sponsored by the paper. A feature of the section was a large display of classified, all two inch spaces, offering better homes by members of the real estate board.

In a page one box the Kingston (N. Y.) Leader classified ad department advises its readers that it is easier to read up and down a column of type than to walk up and down the streets in search of a room, house or apartment.

R. Q. M. Maloney has joined the classified staff of the Manchester (Conn.) Evening Herald.

Electricity melts the stereotype metal for The Appleton Post Crescent

Electric Heat—dependable, economical, and comfortable—has replaced fuel heat in the stereotype pot of the Appleton Post Crescent, Appleton, Wis. The pot has a capacity of 5000 lbs., is fitted with expertly designed G-E heating equipment, and is operated with G-E full automatic control.

The installation is an outstanding success. The temperature of the casting room is 25 degrees lower than before. The high efficiency of the equipment and the accurate, automatic temperature regulation have reduced operating expense. There is less wear and tear on the pot. There is practically no dross on the metal—no contamination by fuel impurities. The saving in metal alone amounts to $1.50 per day.

G-E stereotype pot equipment offers every newspaper a simple and inexpensive method of reducing operating costs. A phone call or letter to the nearest G-E office will bring a G-E industrial heating specialist who will advise you as to the equipment best suited for your casting room.

Phone or write to your nearest G-E office for complete information

Although electric heat will not supplant all other forms of heat for industrial purposes, there are processes in every industry where it is the ideal heat—the most economical heat—the heat that ultimately will be used.

WITH THE GENERAL ADVERTISERS

N. W. Ayer to Launch National Campaign for Swiss Cheese Association —Oil-O-Matic Dealers Praise Newspapers—Piano Men Vote Million Dollar Campaign

A NATIONAL advertising campaign on behalf of genuine Swiss cheese, made in Switzerland, will be undertaken in this country by the Swiss Cheese Association, it has been announced by Dr. Maurice Lustenberger, of Berne, Switzerland, who recently arrived in New York.

Several objectives are in view, Dr. Lustenberger states, and the first is to help the general effort among American cheese interests to educate the public to eat more cheese. The per capita consumption is now only 4.2 pounds in America, as compared with 26 pounds in Switzerland and 11 pounds in England.

The Swiss Cheese Association, which is representative of the dairy, manufacturing and all the exporting elements of the industry in Switzerland, also seeks to protect its product from foreign competition. Dr. Lustenberger states that as much as 2,000,000 pounds of cheese is coming here from various European countries, and sold as "imported Swiss cheese," which the public believes has been imported from Switzerland. An effort will be made to induce the public to demand Switzerland cheese.

The account is being handled by N. W. Ayer & Son, and the initial phase of the advertising effort contemplates full page, four-color spreads in national magazines.

The Pennsylvania Railroad used large newspaper space last week to announce that it had renamed its two crack New York-St. Louis trains, the New Yorker and the St. Louisan, the "Spirit of St. Louis."

The C. U. Williams Oil-O-Matic company held its third convention of representatives and dealers last week at the home plant, Bloomington, Ill., and it became a testimony meeting to the efficiency of newspaper advertising. The Oil-O-Matic corporation has been a consistent user of newspaper space.

A. E. MacInnis, president of the Power Plant Engineering company, Seattle, Wash., which won the honors for two consecutive years in the April sales campaign, gave full credit to his success to his newspaper advertising schedules. The Seattle firm last April sold 614 burners and a year ago sold 369. Other executives of the Oil-O-Matic corporation substantiated Mr. MacInnis' statement that after trying every other form of advertising, newspaper space was proved the most effective selling medium, far overshadowing other methods.

The Boston & Maine Railroad is using newspaper space to induce readers to avoid motoring worries and congested roads by taking advantage of the company's many reduced rate excursions.

New England savings banks and trust companies took advantage of the heavy Lindbergh publicity for advertising purposes. Lindbergh's feat was coupled up with the news, emphasizing the fact that the flyer's savings of $2,000 were of importance in financing the flight when he offered this amount toward the expenses. "What $2,000 meant to Lindbergh," and "Your opportunity may depend on ready money some day" were prominently used.

"Dollar for dollar, our return from newspaper advertising is much greater than from any other form of advertising," declared D. F. Kelly, president of the Fair, large Chicago department store, in addressing 10,000 delegates and guests of the fiftieth annual convention of the National Electric Light Association, held June 10 at Atlantic City.

J. Jay Fuller Agency, Buffalo, has been selected to conduct the joint Community advertising campaign for the village of Kenmore and the town of Tonawanda, N. Y. A fund of $30,000 is being raised for the purpose. Newspaper space will be used exclusively.

The National Piano Manufacturers' Association, in convention at Chicago last week, decided upon a $1,000,000 educational campaign in newspaper advertising for next year to emphasize the value of a piano for every family. The appropriation is double the association's usual advertising budget, and the greater part of it will be spent in newspaper advertising.

ZULU CHIEFTAIN WINS LIBEL DAMAGES

Natal Mercury Must Pay Him £300 for Story Saying He Was Discourteous to Prince of Wales

A trial which has been followed with marked interest throughout South Africa concluded at Maritzburg recently when Chief Solomon (son of Dinizulu and grandson of Cetewayo) was awarded £600 damages against the Natal Mercury for libel. The claim arose out of an allegation by the Mercury that on the occasion of the war dance at Eshowe in honor of the Prince of Wales's visit Solomon was discourteous to the Prince. It was alleged that he used the opportunity—it was the occasion of the largest gathering of Zulus that has taken place for many years—to parade before the assembled Zulus, distracting the dancers, and disorganizing the dance, and withdrawing attention from the Prince.

Solomon in evidence declared that he was not discourteous, that the Zulus insisted upon saluting him and that he was unable to prevent them, and that he was compelled because of the immense crowd to make a detour to reach his place, which brought him amongst the dancers. The people were like grass, he explained. His evidence was supported by C. A. Wheelwright, the Chief Commissioner for Native Affairs, and by Mr. Fynney, magistrate of Nongoma, who is in personal charge of Solomon.

Mr. Graham, however, magistrate for Eshowe, who was in charge of the dance, and was called for the defense, described Solomon's conduct as "not at all good," and generally agreed with the allegations made in the article.

It was also made apparent in evidence and was referred to by the judge in his summing up to the jury that there was a very definite cleavage of opinion as to what Solomon's position should be, one section holding that in view of his descent his special position should be recognized, the other that he should not have any higher status than any other Zulu chief. The trial, which lasted over a week, was followed intently throughout by a very large number of Zulus, who, until steps were taken to stop them, noisily saluted Solomon as he arrived and left the court.

New Telegram Type Makes Reading Easier

From The New York Telegram

Newspaper readers today are given their first introduction to the latest in news type, the new seven-point Linotype Ionic, with which today's editions of The New York Telegram are being printed for the first time.

To illustrate the improvement, two identical statements are published below, one set in the old type and one in the new. You can test for yourself the greater legibility given by this new type, with its wider lines, all of equal width, and its greater depth:—

OLD

These two parallel columns illustrate graphically the improvement made by The Telegram in changing its "type dress."

The wording of the two columns is identical.

The column at the left is printed in the old type which The Telegram has employed for many years and which it now has discarded.

The column at the right is printed in our new seven-point Linotype Ionic type, The Telegram being one of the first to use that "dress" in this size.

Compare the two columns. Note how much more readable the type in the right-hand column is than that in the left-hand column. Observe also that this gain in legibility has been achieved with slight sacrifice of space across the columns.

The adoption of this new "type dress" is only one of many improvements that are being made by The Telegram under Scripps-Howard, ownership.

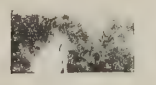
20,681,928 Pairs of Eyes

Think of this vast number of people—enough to fill the Sesqui Stadium at Philadelphia 137 times; the Yale Bowl 258 times; the Yankee Stadium 333 times—enough to fill to overflowing three cities like Greater New York. All these people—nearly one-fifth of the entire population of the United States—are now enjoying the eye comfort that comes with the use of Linotype Ionic No. 5.

Newspapers in all parts of the country, with a combined circulation of 6,893,976, already have adopted it—and statistics tell us there is an average of three readers to each paper.

This is not the accomplishment of years, but of months—for Ionic was unheard of a year ago. Metropolitan dailies and rural weeklies find it equally well suited to their needs. It is made in four sizes—5½, 6½, 6¾ and 7 Point.



Ionic is a space saver, an eye saver, and a time saver in the stereotyping department and pressroom. It has the hearty approval of internationally known eye specialists, psychologists, educators, publishers, advertisers and readers. The eyes of the world are on Ionic.

LITTLE MENDER OF BROKEN HEARTS LOST IN CITY'S DIZZY WHIRL

By ALFRED SEGAL.

MRS. J. SALES DIAZ' bullfinch was born in the Black Forest of Germany. Perhaps it should be stated in the beginning for the benefit of cave dwellers that a bullfinch is not a cud chewing animal that provides beef, or a dog. It is a bird.

And it is told that a certain bullfinch once went to fan the fevered brow of a sick child with his wings, but it may have been the robin in Oscar Wilde's "Happy Prince" that did this. We can't remember.

However, this, too, may be only a fairy tale.

GEORGIA EDITORS TO VIE FOR TROPHY

Hal M. Stanley Award for Typographical Excellence Contains Copy of Poor Richards Almanac—To Be Awarded August

At the annual meeting of the Georgia Press Association to be held at Eatonton, Georgia, in August, members of the association will get the first view of the Hal M. Stanley trophy, which Mr. Stanley, corresponding secretary of the association, is to present to the organization to be awarded annually to the Georgia weekly newspaper presenting the best typographical appearance.

The basis of the trophy is a copy of Poor Richards Almanac printed in 1756 and containing data for 1757. The almanac was printed by Benjamin Franklin and D. Hall. The author of the almanac was Richard Saunders, according to the information on the fly leaf.

The trophy consists of a glass case that contains a copy of the almanac which because of its age is of marked value and a bust of Franklin. The inscriptions inside the case are as follows:

ALMANAC
Printed by Benjamin Franklin,
America's First Printer, in the Year
1756,
Twenty Years Before the Declaration of Independence
1776.

On a copper plate within the case is this legend:

Typographical Appearance
Under Rules and Regulations Prescribed by
The Board of Managers.

The board of managers has decreed that the contestants shall be limited to country newspapers. In this way it is hoped to inspire the representative newspapers of the Georgia press—largely in the weekly field—to improve their typographical appearance.

Armed Guards Failed to Deter Bluefield, W. Va., Cameramen at Wreck Scene

While attempting to obtain pictures of the wreck of the Virginian Railway near Ingleside, W. Va., when two trainmen were killed, representatives of the Bluefield (W. Va.) Daily Telegraph were ordered to leave by armed guards.

Efforts at intimidation were not carried to the point of violence, but the newspaper men were told by high Virginian Railway officials that they would not be permitted to take pictures, whether on or off the right of way. When they asked for an explanation, they were threatened with arrest if they did not leave at once.

When an appeal to county officials failed, they left the right of way and kept the officials interested while other parties took the pictures for them. They got more than two dozen exposures.

EDITOR'S WASTEBASKET GETS COSTLY PUBLICITY

Year's Puffery Postage Would Buy 132 Columns of Advertising Blytheville (Ark) Courier News, Editorial Says

Expensive publicity matter carrying first class postage is being filed in the editorial wastebasket of the Blytheville (Ark.) Courier News, readers of that paper were recently told in an editorial.

One morning's propaganda crop carried $3.64 in postage, a total of $1,328.60 in a year, which "would buy 132 columns of advertising space at the regular rates," the editorial stated.

Following, in part, is how the paper views this "insidious propaganda":

"The Courier News is a small newspaper compared with the metropolitan dailies. On the other hand, the Courier News is much larger, and maybe more important, than thousands of other publications issued from the smaller towns and cities. For the purpose of this discussion, we shall call it an average newspaper.

"And, as the publisher of an average American newspaper, we can bear witness to this increasing volume of publicity matter, which comes from all points.

"Each morning we find on our desk more than a hundred pieces of mail matter, and each bearing first-class postage. Some of these 'letters' bear the return cards of the senders—known parasites—and these are cast into the waste basket unopened. Others come in plain enclosures. These are opened, given a cursory glance and are tossed into the same receptacle.

"Some of these may contain matter of public interest. We do not know. In days before the little rivulet developed into a great river we waded through, and occasionally we were rewarded with a meritorious item. But this publicity evil has grown to such proportions that we have neither the time nor the disposition to read it.

"The postage on the publicity matter on our desk this morning amounted to $3.64. Just an average day—which means that at least $1,328.60 a year is being wasted on publicity matter addressed to this office. This sum would buy 132 columns of advertising space at the regular rates.

"Some day, perhaps, these seekers after free publicity will learn that the newspapers worth-while have ceased to be gullible, and that the average daily newspaper needs all of the space at its command for local and telegraph news, and for the advertisements of those who are willing to pay their way in the world."

Edgar G. Harris is editor of the Courier News.

JOURNAL TO OPERATE WTMJ

The Milwaukee (Wis.) Journal has started work on its own broadcasting station, WTMJ, which is expected to come on the air within two months. The Journal, which has been broadcasting over WHAD, jointly with Marquette University, since 1923, will discontinue programs from that station, which will be operated exclusively by the university. Officials of the paper also announced the purchase of WKAF, which letters will be replaced by WTMJ.

TO HONOR INGHAM

Harvey Ingham, editor of the Des Moines (Ia.) Register and Tribune-Capital, will be tendered a dinner at the Hotel Fort Des Moines, July 1, celebrating his 25th anniversary as editor of the papers.

"Service Makes the Linotype the Superior Machine"

"Letter and matrices reached us this morning. We are greatly appreciative of the courtesy and service extended in this instance. The Fine Hyphen Leaders were returned this morning.

"It is the service and courtesy such as was given in this instance which makes the Linotype the superior machine, and the friends of the machine more numerous."

HOPS OFF FOR EAST INDIES

Van Lear Black of Baltimore Starts on Long Plane Trip

Van Lear Black, chairman of the board of directors of the Baltimore Sun, departed from the Schipol Airdrome, Amsterdam, Holland, June 15, as a passenger in a plane he chartered for a flight to the East Indies. Before taking off, he declared it was no stunt trip and no record would be attempted, although he gave the impression that he might even go beyond the East Indies and it was quite possible he might land in Australia in a few days' time.

The primary object of the trip, he explained, was a personal observation of protracted flying and the varying atmospheric conditions. He said that quick communication makes for the best association between the nations of the world.

Mr. Black is accompanied by Pilot Scholte and Geysendorff and his valet who have already flown with him some thousands of miles over Europe.

TOOK HOSPITAL JOB

N. Y. News Man Acted as Orderly to Learn Earl Carroll's Condition

Martin Sommers, a reporter on the staff of the New York Daily News, got a job as orderly in the Greenville, S. C. hospital to get inside facts for his paper on the condition of Earl Carroll, theatrical producer, before he was ordered to Atlanta.

"I went," he wrote in one of his first stories telling about the stunt, "in a straight reporter's make-up—a three day beard, run-down heels, great-kneed trousers and pockets innocent of coin—to the hospital gate."

He had to work from 7 P. M. to 7 A. M. and his pay was $11 a week.

"The duties of a night hospital orderly are manifold, but mostly unmentionable," he said.

GROWTH OF CARTOONS AND COMICS SHOWN BY STUDENT'S SURVEY

Increase of 123 Per Cent in 25 Years from 1899 to 1923 Shown—Local Political Cartoons Show Decline—Big Advance in Sports Drawings

By MYRA M. WATERMAN

THE phenomenal growth of cartoons and comics in newspapers was graphically shown recently in a survey made as a requirement of a graduate degree in the Pulitzer School of Journalism, Columbia University, New York. A single newspaper, the New York World, was chosen for the survey, covering the years 1899 to 1923. An average of five years around these two dates was taken to insure accuracy, and the following percentages were computed:

Local politics	6% decline
Comic cartoons	212% decline
National and Foreign	19% increase
Seasonal cartoons	109% increase
Comic strips	327% increase
Sport cartoons	386% increase
Civic cartoons	552% increase
Caricatures	1023% increase
Total, cartoons and comics	123% increase

It is interesting to note the corresponding increases and declines in editorial space. In a survey made for EDITOR & PUBLISHER for May 31, 1924, figures compiled by Wilcox in 1899 and White, in 1923, were compared and the percentage of space delegated by 63 leading American newspapers to various phases of the news tallied. The following results were computed:

Miscellaneous	32% decline
Editorials	77% decline
Letters to editor	180% decline
Society	275% decline
General news	1% increase
Political news	1% increase
Business news	4% increase
Foreign news	9% increase
Advertising	43% increase
Sport news	47% increase
Crime news	58% increase
Illustrations	84% increase

In order to compare the two tables, it was necessary to split the classification of political cartoons into different divisions from the first classification, grouping national and local politics together and separating foreign. Placing side by side the classifications that are directly parallel, the following figures show that in most fields the pictorial side of the news is taking much larger steps ahead, in the matter of space, than the written.

	63 Paper Survey	World Cartoon Survey
Politics	1% increase	12% decline
Foreign Affairs	9% increase	1015% increase
Sport	47% increase	386% increase
Crime	58% increase	133% increase (Social cartoons)
Illustrations	84% increase	123% increase (Cartoons and Comics)

The table needs a word of explanation. Following the war there was a general slump in local and national politics other than as they affected foreign situations. The five years included in the average, 1921-1923, saw the regular space devoted to cartoons dealing with European adjustments of one sort and another. The five years previous to the war itself show even a higher percentage of cartoons which have been listed under "Foreign." In almost all of these, the United States is represented by Uncle Sam, or an equally familiar personification, but they have been classified under "Foreign" because they are of a much wider scope than mere national.

In the survey labelled "Social," such things have been taken into consideration as disasters affecting a great many people, crime, such considerations of graft that implied more than a mere political classification, charities, etc.

Civic cartoons includes all phases of New York life and affairs that are not directly political. The cartoon on the first page of the second section of the World is often civic. The cartoon on the last page, "Metropolitan Movies" has been classed as civic in import.

The growth in caricature has represented a shift in type of caricature as well as an increase use of the media. In the 90's, all caricatures were concerned with men important in the news. As political cartoons came more and more into use these caricatures were incorporated into the cartoons, and while important men were being ridiculed just as much as ever through the use of the caricature, the pictures were no longer mere caricatures. On the other hand, the use of the caricature as a pure portrayal was not abandoned, and the theatre page became the place where such drawings were usually to be found. One picking up a newspaper now one would find that almost the only pure caricatures are those of theatrical people.

The comic strip has grown from two consecutive pictures, in 1884, to four pages or more of color on Sunday and a strip or two, eight columns wide, on week days. No growth has been so steady or consistent as this branch of graphic art.

Sport cartoons were the slowest of any type in getting started, but show a steady increase after their inception. Although a few sport cartoons appeared before 1895, there were none over three or four inches until then. Some of the first sport cartoons appeared on the front page, some on the society page.

Nothing demonstrates the steady trend toward pictorial news so much as does a comparison of these surveys. The only noticeable declines are in local and national politics and these are easily accounted for by the international trend of all news and pictures. Comic cartoons, one picture meant purely tto amuse have been replaced by the caricatures and comic strips.

EPORTERS' QUESTIONS OFTEN SUGGEST NO" ANSWER WHEN THEY WANT "YES"

n Who Say "You Wouldn't Care to Disclose, Would You," Usually Find Interviewee Wouldn't—Some Wrong Approaches Cited

By YANDELL C. CLINE

'OU don't care to tell the considera- tion, do you?" one of our reporters ired the other day in getting in- nation about a big real estate deal and eby spoiled a good story.

Then this same thing occurred a sec- time soon afterwards, we saw just t had happened and then sought some od of getting people to disclose con- rations after deals had been made, many times this constitutes the big s of the story.

ne form of the question used by reporter was bad, a member of our , who had studied something about psychology of salesmanship, told us. explained that the question, as it phrased, called for a negative an- and emphasized that it would be most natural thing for the person tioned to say "No" to it.

'e changed the question to "What the amount of the consideration, se?", which our psychologically in- d friend told us would get results, our average on real estate considera- began to perk up.

his experience caused us to study e of the questions asked by our re- rs in their day's work. We found "Do you mind if I quote you?" was nearly as productive of a bang-up story as some remark such as t's fine, I'll quote you on that." no question is asked in the revised the person interviewed does not called on to answer, but takes the of least resistance in most instances says nothing. On the other hand, ne reporter asks him if he minds quoted, the fact that perhaps he ld mind is suggested to him. Then big Goblin Misquotation appears be- him and he says emphatically that oes mind and that he does not want e quoted.

the same category with "You don't to tell the consideration, do you?" "Do you care to tell the considera- " which is a trifle better, but no , are such questions as "Would you to give me your name and age?" "Do you care to tell us what he of?" Much better, we found, is w, give me your name and age, e," which is almost a command, but tive, and "What did he die of, e?"

e had quite a problem in getting news ccidents and other such things that le did not particularly care to see e paper. We checked up and found our reporter was inquiring, "Was Blank in an accident yesterday?", h many times brought a denial, while ange in the inquiry to "Tell me about Blank's accident, please" turned the surveying our news-gathering con- tion we found that "Know any ?" brings "No" for an answer much readily than "Yes" and that "What ou know in the way of news today?" es the person questioned to scratch ead and think hard, for the question nes that he does know something. id, incidentally, we taboo that old lby "Know anything today?" for the n that some persons took offense at Likewise, a reporter in another city us something, although he did not ze it, when he was heard to say in course of his work "Got any yarns me to print?" and later "What kind es have you for me to print today?" type of question we consider as un- ming to the newspaper profession and gnified for a newspaper man.

nother thing, in both telephone and on-to-person conversatio- our re- rs, after getting a piece of news, instructed to ask "Now, what else you tell me?" This question many s brings to the surface stories of greater value than those originally given.

To eliminate all possible lost motion our reporters are instructed in telephone conversations after determining that they have the right number to say, "This is the Republican, let me have Mr. Jones, please." Before this plan was adopted they were inclined to go through something like this: "Is Mr. Jones there?" to which there probably was an answer of "Yes." Then the reporter would say "Let me speak to him, please." Many times would come the inquiry "Who is this?" and then the explanation "The Republican." We encourage reporters to use the paper's name in preference to their own name. The paper is better known, carries greater prestige than the individual and usually the business at hand can be transacted more quickly, in the name of the paper, we find.

A survey of some of the stock conversation, especially questions which the editorial department of the average newspaper uses in gathering the happenings of the day, probably will disclose some interesting things. Make a list one of these days and see what you get!

NO GOOD BUSINESS IN BAD CIVILIZATION DR. FRANK TELLS ADVERTISERS

National Industrial Advertisers Association Meeting in Cleveland, Hears "High-Pressure Salesmanship" Denounced—Hopkins New President

CLEVELAND, Ohio, June 15.—J. R. Hopkins, of the Chicago Belting Company, Chicago, was elected president of the National Industrial Advertisers' Association at the final session of the three-day convention at the Hotel Statler.

Other officers chosen included: N. S. Greensfelder, Philadelphia, first vice-president; George Corey, Cleveland, second vice-president; H. P. Sigwalt, Milwaukee, third vice-president, and H. Van P. Thomas, St. Louis, secretary-treasurer.

A jury in a mock trial decided that "We have a scientific method for measuring advertising effectiveness." The trial featured the closing day.

The hearing was conducted in legal manner before "Judge" Bennett Chapple, Cleveland.

The prosecuting attorneys were Allan B. Cook, vice-president of the Guardian Trust Company, Cleveland; Arthur G. Hopcraft, purchasing commissioner of Cleveland, and A. L. Ferguson, Structural Service Bureau, Philadelphia. A. B. Greenleaf, People's Gas, Light & Coke Co., Chicago, was the defense attorney. He summoned five character witnesses: M. J. Evans, Chicago; R. H. Griswold, Cleveland; Wharton Clay, Chicago; J. P. Glaser, Detroit, and J. C. McQuiston, Pittsburgh.

American manufacturers of machinery are not getting what they are entitled to in world machinery trade, William H. Rastall, director of the Bureau of Foreign and Domestic Commerce of the Department of Commerce, told the delegates Tuesday.

The mechanical engineering industry of the entire world is a business of $3,600,000,000 annually. Of this amount $600,000,000 falls into international trade—and this amount is a target for American manufacturers of machinery to shoot at, Rastall said.

"American machinery has a position of world leadership," Rastall said.

"The most serious foreign competition is found in Germany and the United Kingdom. Yet last year Great Britain bought $18,000,000 worth of machinery here and Germany spent $5,000,000 for American made machinery. What does this indicate?"

The first day, Dr. Glenn Frank, president of the University of Wisconsin, pleaded for "Beauty in the everyday life of Mr. and Mrs. John Citizen," and he placed the burden for such a Utopia on the shoulders of the delegates.

He said an advertising man is "more than a mere coiner of words to catch the ear of the credulous and persuade him to buy what he does not want."

Said he:

"His work is the highest type of social statesmanship. His facility for slogan is merely a tool. It is upon the fertility of the economic soil that his success depends and hence it appears we cannot have good business flourishing in a bad civilization.

"We must increase the sanity of consumption as well as its largeness. Advertising deals with the whole technique of salesmanship. It goes farther than the gaudy tricks of the high pressure salesman, who has learned in six snappy lessons. The 'high pressure' man is the caricature of the real genius of salesmanship or advertising. He is the proof that salesmen, like athletes, may be overtrained.

"Amid all the clamor and babbittry of 'super-salesmen,' sanity is reappearing. We know that the salesman or advertising man must know far more than he uses in order to use what he uses effectively. He depends upon information rather than argument. I have been argued and 'high pressured' into buying things—but I have always resented it."

James F. Lincoln, president of the Lincoln Electric Company, Cleveland, opened the Monday session in an address urging advertising writers to avoid superlatives in their copy.

O. C. Harn, managing director of the Audit Bureau of Circulations, urged the delegates to insist on A. B. C. reports. The annual banquet was held in the Winton Hotel Rainbow Gardens.

MARKET REPORTS—sports—local, domestic and foreign news!—the paper that gets them on the street first has the prestige—the circulation—the better standing in the "ad lineage" comparison.

Business Managers know that "getting it on the street first" is as much a matter of mechanical equipment as of personnel. On presses, for example, C-H Automatic Control gets the "O.K." of the B.M., because of its exclusive features that save press time in adjustments, make-ready and running. Features that also protect motor and presses from those inopportune break-downs that "news men" regard as calamitous.

The business manager who wants to put his sheet in a new, fast stride, a stride that means more profit for his paper, will investigate the advantages offered by C-H Press Control.

WHAT OUR READERS SAY

PUBLISHER PRAISES AGENCY

o EDITOR & PUBLISHER: On March the Terrell Daily (Tex.) Tribune car- an advertisement for the Continental company, placed by the H. K. Mc- n Company. The ad did not show exactly as we thought it should and, keeping with our policy of rendering very best possible service to our for- advertisers, we wrote the agency, nitting the appearance of the ad was of the best and requesting a date a "make good" insertion. In reply to letter we have just received the fol- ing from the agency. which we believe be good enough to pass along:

In accordance with your letter of y 13, in regard to insertion of March , for the advertising of the Con- ntal Oil Company.

You are right that this ad was not erted as clear as it might have been, nevertheless we do not think that its wing powers were handicapped. Rath- than issue a make-good we are remit- for the original insertion.

We wish to thank you for the interest have shown in this particular matter.

"H. K. McCANN COMPANY.
"C. Burke."

How many agencies in the country uld have been as liberal in their views this matter and, instead of "shooting are," would have hounded the paper il a makegood insertion was given, or haps, declined a make-good and also used payment on the grounds of bad nt? It shows beyond all doubt that McCann company has some real hu- n beings in its organization in whose ns flows the milk of human kindness, l their policy in this matter is bound win the friendship and admiration of publishers of the country.

The Tribune is indeed glad to state t it does business with but very few encies not of the very highest type. Its ort is to do business with no other d, but we believe the McCann letter the most refreshing we have ever re- ved in our newspaper experience, cov- ng a period of more than twenty-five ars. It comes to us like a bottle of sewater out of an ocean of brine.

And while writing about agencies, I ve a little something else I want to out of my system:

Why is it that all advertising agencies, sending out their schedules, do not ve a fairly uniform system, giving cor- ct and simplified insertion dates, to- ther with the number of the copy to pear on a given date? Many agencies this now, and to such the average news- per man rises up in gratitude and calls em blessed. But there are some that em to make up their schedules with e primary end in view of getting the blisher "bumfuzzled" as to the proper py to insert. We regret to say it, but rned if it don't look like it is done rough design to get the newspaper man ossed in his signals, make a mess of and then give the agency a basis for demand for a "make-good" insertion.

he following is not an exaggeration of me of the problem-schedules received: "Beginning the second week after the ceipt of necessary cuts, insert ad No. LY3, on Wednesday, alternating with LJ3, scheduled to appear on the first ednesday after the first full moon in ch month. After the first four inser- ons omit the second week of the third onth. Then beginning on the fourth onth, insert the first twenty days. Then ter three insertions of 3YLJ3, holding py No. 3JLY3, until the next sched- ed date after the three consecutive in- rtions of No. 3YLJ3. You will then ntinue schedule in regular order, alter- ting the copy the first two weeks and e last week of each month."

For the average man to figure out com- exities of such an order requires two lendars, and almanac, an adding ma- ine, fountain pen, lead pencil, three asers—yes, it will take more than ree erasers—two paper clips, nine as- rin, two hours of mental anguish and the services of a reliable bootlegger,— who dispenses triple run stuff from charred kegs—and following which the newspaper man is unfit for any more work for the day. And then, after all this travail and tribulation, he will receive during the course of the following month a letter from the agency advising him that every ad has been inserted exactly backwards. That he not only inserted 3YLJ3 on the days that 3JLY3 should have appeared, but that they were inserted on the wrong Wednesdays.

Then is when it happens that a fellow's hair, as luxuriant as that of the Seven Sutherland Sisters and almost as long, begins to slip and perspiration as large as green plums begins to exude from his epidermis. And all this without excuse or extenuation—for if over one-half of the agencies can submit readily understandable schedules, why not all? Would it not be easier for the agency have a man sit down and figure out a schedule and have it exactly right, than it would be to send out these 'problem schedules' to hundreds of newspapers and have the publishers thereof to waste their time and energy in deciphering, only to be informed later that they have pulled a boner, with the accompanying request for make-good insertions? The publisher not only loses his time and energy in working the puzzles, but he also loses the space the ads occupy as well.

A fellow is supposed to show some signs of intelligence after he has been in the newspaper game 25 or 30 years, but damned if he doesn't feel like he's a non compos mentis, after he gets through with one of the "problem schedules" referred to.

It appears that concerted action on the part of the press and a little co-operation on the part of agencies would do much toward the elimination of the practice, and give the agencies better service.

Here's hopin' for the best.

NEWSPAPERS LIBERAL TO CHURCH NEWS

Rev. Stelzle Reports Many Stories Released by I. A. A. Departmental Printed—Outlines Year's Work

The extent to which newspapers, advertising clubs, radio stations and outdoor advertising agencies have co-operated in the dissemination of religious information is outlined in a report of the year's activities of the Church Advertising Department of the International Advertising Association, just issued by the Rev. Charles Stelzle, chairman of the department.

"Thousands of stories and many hundreds of editorials were printed in co-operation with its plans," he said.

This entire work cost the department only $6,000, Mr. Stelzle reported. No salaries were paid and the department operated mainly through the 200 advertising clubs connected with the International Advertising Association and the local church federations in the various cities.

Wide newspaper publicity was given to a questionnaire on religious beliefs, and also to a study of religious beliefs of college students, which indicated that students as a whole were more sympathetic toward religion than the public at large, said Mr. Stelzle's report.

The department is arranging for a series of conferences at the Denver Convention of the International Advertising Association the latter part of this month, during which psychology of church advertising. newspapers, letters, illustrations and co-operation in church advertising will be discussed. Paid newspaper advertising by the churches will be featured.

I. T. U. COUNCIL FIGHTS TO HOLD POWER

President Howard's Failure to Submit Question to A. F. of L. for Arbitration Likely to Bring Dispute to Convention Floor

Details of the controversy which has waged since last fall between President Charles Howard and the executive council of the International Typographical Union are given in a full-page statement in the current issue of the Typographical Journal. Basic elements of the international union's policy are involved in the dispute, which is likely to continue until the next convention, which meets in Indianapolis beginning Aug. 8.

The gist of the statement, which is in the form of an editorial, follows:

On Nov. 1, 1926, there was a change in the presidency. At that time there were 25 organizers who had been appointed by retiring President Lynch, the appointments having been approved by the executive council. President Howard instructed 12 organizers to cease work, unless advised of reappointment, to accomplish a reduction in the number of organizers. The other four members of the executive council took issue with the president, and said that such action could only be taken by the council itself.

On Dec. 9, 1926, the four majority members of the council endeavored to devise a plan to solve the controversy, which they said had arisen because President Howard refused to permit the executive council to function under authority of the constitution of the International Typographical Union.

In the January issue of the Typographical Journal, President Howard offered to submit the controversy "to any fair agency upon which the council may agree."

The four members of the Council offered in February to submit the question to the executive council of the American Federation of Labor.

The March Typographical Journal contained President Howard's suggestion that the four members of the Council ascertain if the executive council of the American Federation of Labor would assemble to hear both sides present their arguments.

Immediately after this offer of President Howard was made known, Vice-Presidents Brown and Hewson went to Washington and conferred with President Green of the American Federation of Labor, who told them that, if both sides were willing to submit the case, the Federation council would be polled or the request could be submitted to the next regular meeting of the Federation council. The two vice-presidents returned to Indianapolis and informed President Howard of the position of President Green. The American Federation of Labor Council convened in Indianapolis on May 10, 1927. Anticipating this meeting, the four members on May 6 submitted to President Howard their formulation of the controversial question:

"Is the President of the International Union correct in his opinion that the Commissions of representatives of the International Typographical Union expire coterminously with the term of office of the President who appointed them?"

President Howard submitted his counter statement under date of May 12th:

"Did the President exceed authority conferred upon him by the Constitution and Laws of the Typographical Union in reducing the number of organizers?"

On May 16 the four members of the executive council accepted the amended question and requested President Howard to send the question to the executive council of the American Federation of Labor for determination. This he did not do, but left Indianapolis that night. The executive council of the A. F. of L. adjourned the next day, having completed its business.

The four members of the council maintain that the controversy is not a question of the removal or appointment of representatives. They insist that the provisions of the I. T. U. constitution must prevail and that the council as a whole should be heard on all questions over which it has authority.

U. P. MAN BROADCASTS STORY FROM PLANE

Arrival of U. S. S. Memphis Told by W. J. McEvoy by Radio in First Successful Attempt to Report From the Air

For the first time in newspaper and radio history the story of a great event was broadcast by radio from the airplane to a press office at Washington this week.

William J. McEvoy, staff correspondent attached to the Washington bureau of the United Press, reported by radio the final stages of the triumphal progress of the U. S. S. cruiser Memphis up the Potomac to Washington.

William J. McEvoy

Dr. J. H. Dellinger, Commerce Department radio chief, whose scientific work had made this achievement possible, assigned his assistant, C. B. Hempel, to accompany McEvoy from Bolling Field in a Ford tri-motor plane. The Ford Company of Detroit, to aid in this demonstration, had permitted the Government to equip its ship with the necessary radio apparatus.

Sitting in a wicker chair in the spacious cabin of the Ford air liner with seven other passengers, McEvoy spoke into a transmitter identical with those employed by telephone operators. His description of the voyage of the Memphis up the Potomac was sent out on the air through radio apparatus aboard the plane and picked up at the Commerce Department Radio Station at College Park, Md.

The College Park station rebroadcast his voice on 375 meters for public reception on ordinary receiving sets. In addition, his voice was put on a telephone wire and carried direct to the United Press office in Washington, where the report was copied just as any dictated story is taken by telephone.

As the plane met the Memphis, it took its course along with other commercial aircraft, flying at an altitude of about 1,500 feet. To permit McEvoy to observe the vessel from all angles and give a complete picture of the movement of Army and Navy planes in the air reception, the Ford machine was maneuvered back to Washington through a succession of circles above the Memphis.

McEvoy's broadcast story was chiefly a description of the Memphis' progress up the Potomac and of the cloud of airplanes darting above it.

SUN MAN'S EDITORIAL WIDELY ACCLAIMED

Hundreds Ask Reprints of "Lindbergh Flies Alone" Written by Harold M. Anderson — Prominently Displayed in Stores

Prominently displayed in store windows during the celebration in New York this week were large promotion cards of the New York Sun carrying a Sun editorial, "Lindbergh Flies Alone," which appeared in that paper May 21, while the flyer was winging his way across the Atlantic. It was written by Harold M. Anderson, for many years with the Sun.

Hundreds of requests from readers for reprints of the editorial were complied with and 1,000 of the large window cards were distributed.

The editorial follows:

"Lindbergh Flies Alone"

Alone?

Is he alone at whose right side rides Courage, with Skill within the cockpit and Faith upon the left? Does solitude surround the brave when Adventure leads the way and Ambition reads the dials? Is there no company with him for whom the air is cleft by Daring and the darkness is made light by Emprise.

True, the fragile bodies of his fellows do not weigh down his plane; true, the fretful minds of weaker men are lacking from his crowded cabin; but as his airship keeps her course he holds communion with those rarer spirits that inspire to intrepidity and by their sustaining potency give strength to arm, resource to mind, content to soul.

Alone? With what other companions would that man fly to whom the choice were given?

This editorial engraved on a silver tablet was presented to Col. Lindbergh, Thursday afternoon by William T. Dewart, publisher of the Sun. The presentation took place at the Sun office.

Mr. Dewart also presented Col. Lindburgh with an illuminated copy of the editorial, which the aviator immediately turned over to Mr. Anderson, with this endorsement:

"In turn I present this example of exquisite English to its author, Mr. Harold M. Anderson, and with it goes my highest appreciation. Charles A. Lindburgh."

As many members of the editorial and mechanical staffs as could attend crowded into the Sun parlor.

Editorial make-over is a subject whic is receiving attention more than ev from the business office during the pa few months. Some keen business exec tives have the cost of make-overs figure to the mill for each department involve and lose no opportunity to warn the ed torial staff that "replates cost money. Several managing editors with whor this topic has been discussed held tha while expenses might be cut by holdin mid-edition make-overs to a minimun there was real danger that a desk wit its mind on the cost of a make-ove was likely to follow the line of leas resistance. Evening papers, the opinion ran, would find its short-sighted economy to save make-over cost at the expens of failing to keep minute-to-minute pac with a rapidly developing story. Thes editors had no objection to a close busi ness-office check on the cost of thei activities, they said, but they did no wish to balance their judgment as to the news value of a story against the "down stairs office" desire to save the 50 cent or dollar cost of a remade page. Wher make-overs are necessitated by editorial or composing room errors, editorial executives and publishers have their own general and particular methods for han dling the situation.

Our Own World of Letters

By JAMES MELVIN LEE

ESPECIALLY appropriate as a title for the booklet written by Henry Justin Smith and published by the Chicago Daily News would have been "Our Own World of Letters." Instead, Mr. Smith has chosen "Genius on Newspaper Row" for his story of the "delicate, or wayward, or explosive natures involved with that powerful engine, that monument of propriety, that pyramid of rules and regulations, the daily newspaper." In other words, the booklet is the story of newspaper men who have achieved success in the field of literature. Of them Mr. Smith speaking in general terms, comments as follows:

> If one takes a trip through biographical literature, he will be surprised to find how many writers of great gifts, men on the threshold of lasting renown, have experimented with the newspaper as their medium. Some because they simply must be published somewhere, or die; others, because they must receive cold cash regularly, or starve; a few others, because editorial lion-tamers have tried to build iron cages for them. The experiment, however motivated, has usually ended in failure. As well seek to harness a roebuck to a treadmill as try to bind a poet to the gears and wheels of a modern Daily Thunderer. On the other hand, it has been in journalistic surroundings that many a writer has passed years remembered among his happiest—those bitter but ecstatic years of struggle and growth. And the despised, but eagerly accepted weekly dole has been like a pair of water-wings, furnishing to the man of genius his only means of swimming in the surf of competitive civilization.

Mr. Smith passes by the pioneer printers who achieved success in letters in the colonial period of American history and starts in at about the beginning of the nineteenth century—when Walt Whitman was editing the Brooklyn Eagle, to be exact. Of Whitman this pen portrait is given:

> There emerges from a little house on Myrtle Avenue, Brooklyn, a tall man of 27, a rugged figure with straying black hair, full beard and shirt open at the neck. Serene of aspect, but with a glint in his blue eye, he lounges along the street, pausing to talk to workmen, peering into the windows of shops, watching the birds in their flight. Perhaps the notion takes him to sit by the roadside for an hour or two, thinking. It is, at least, a matter of no hurry to reach his office, which lies a long mile from his home. The paper may go to press or not, for all he cares. Others of his staff may have been at work since an early hour; but it is toward noon before his leisurely progress brings him to the door of the newspaper "plant." And after a short time at his desk he will again go tramping, dreaming, maybe writing a little, maybe not.

Whitman is quoted as making this remark about the days when he edited the Brooklyn Eagle, "I had one of the pleasantest sits (situations) of my life—a good owner, good pay, easy work, and convenient hours." Mr. Smith believes that it was the vagabond element in Whitman, the inability to do routine things well, which explains his departure from the news-factory.

Mr. Smith pays a nice tribute to the campaigns which Whitman conducted while editing the Eagle and then mentions some of the later connections which Whitman had with the press as he sat in the editorial chair of the Brooklyn Times, the New Orleans Crescent and his own radical paper, The Freeman. "Journalism passed into new phases," to quote from the booklet, "enterprise and persistence won it a formidable role in American life, but journalism did not, could not, take Walt Whitman with it in its orbit."

The next genius on newspaper row to be mentioned by Mr. Smith is Edgar Allan Poe who won fame on Park Row by his balloon hoax story sold to the New York Sun. This hoax told how a flying machine had crossed the Atlantic in three days. The press of today has just printed the truth of such a flight. Of Poe, Smith remarks, "Truth in the abstract, sincerity in art, he cherished; but for little things like the facts of an event he cared nothing." In other words, he would not "fetch and carry." Poe's affection for printers' ink and for the odor of a newspaper shop is then taken up in the booklet.

Mr. Smith then moves on to another period and passes to a different section of the country where he finds another genius on newspaper row—two, to be exact, Bret Harte and Samuel Clemens. Harte, so Mr. Smith tells the reader, had neither the ability nor the temperament for the newspaper grind and never could be depended upon to supply copy on time to his printers. Samuel Clemens, on the other hand, "was a real newspaper man, capable of back-breaking toil and with a polemical eye toward public abuses."

Clemens worked on The San Francisco Call and has left this glimpse of his routine assignments:

> "At nine in the morning I had to be at the police court for an hour and make a brief history of the squabbles of the night before. They were usually between Irishmen and Irishmen, and Chinamen and Chinamen, and now and then a squabble between the two races, for a change. During the rest of the day we raked the town from end to end, gathering such material as we might, wherewith to fill our required columns; and if there were no fires to report, we started some. At night we visited the six theaters, one after the other, seven nights in the week. We remained in each of those places five minutes, got the merest passing glimpse of play and opera, and with that for a text we wrote up those plays and operas. . . . It was fearful drudgery—soulless drudgery—and almost destitute of interest. It was awful slavery for a lazy man."

The next genius on newspaper row upon whom Smith turns the literary spotlight is Lafcadio Hearn. It is of him that Smith writes as follows:

> Cincinnati, of all places in the world! W. D. Howells had worked there, but even that fact leaves the Ohio metropolis pretty barren of literary tradition. It was an odd wind-current of destiny that blew to the crude Cincinnati of the '70s so alien, so delicate, a being as Lafcadio, and one reads with a shade of doubt the stories of his beginnings there. Too much like the conventional tale of the "cub who gained fame at a bound" is the standard account, which runs something like this:
> There came to a news-room, undoubtedly that of the Enquirer, a shabby, shrinking figure. Newspaper experience? No. Special ability? None. There was no job for him, but the busy editor permitted the stranger to sit about the office, and there he sat, patiently, day after day, never given an assignment, scarcely ever addressed. And then, just as happens in the fiction magazines, a great fire broke loose. The older men were absent; the shadowy Hearn was the only hope. In despair the editor sent him out; in triumph the "cub" returned; and next morning, so the story ends, all Cincinnati talked of the magnificent description Hearn had written.

Hearn, too, hated the routine of the news-room. But he continued to cling to his poor little meal ticket. "In the small hours of the morning, with the discarded papers and proofs of the night's work around him, he would sit in the office torturing his lame eyes under a gas-jet, while he translated Gautier." Smith then tells about Hearn's newspaper farewell in Cincinnati and describes all too briefly Hearn's editorial connection with the Times Democrat of New Orleans.

From New Orleans Smith returns to New York to sketch the portraits of the bright young men who in the early '90s were working for Dana on the Sun. Of that paper Smith chats as follows about its style in presenting the news:

> The Sun style of news article used to be held up before us beginners as the perfect model; just as the short magazine story of that period, sparkling, terse, canny, and invariably leaving a "good taste in the mouth," was thought to be a permanent work of art, instead of only a painted tin can, doomed to the rubbish heap. The influence of the "Sun crowd" upon American newspapers was, nevertheless, very great for a time. It did, at least, touch greater rhetorical polish and shrewder insight; but it represented only a compromise, after all; an adjustment of certain willing minds to the limitations of the newspaper; a half-hearted attempt by newspaper editors to give genius its fling. And, in vivid contrast with the Gallagher and Chimmy Fadden sort of writing, there was in the New York of that day a young experimenter who, trying as hard as any of them to make a living by reporting, could not bend his talent to meet the taboos of the time, nor swallow its success maxims.

The young experimenter mentioned in the quotation just made is of course Stephen Crane, who "sat about one newspaper office after another and contrived phrases which appalled yet fascinated editors, and which one would gladly read today; but as often as he produced them, they fell before the rigid pencils of copy-readers who 'knew what was what.'"

Yet Crane was, as Smith points out, a real genius of newspaper row.

From New York Smith jumps to his own windy city of Chicago. Here possibly he is at his best as he paints the vignettes of such men as Eugene Field, Peter Finley Dunne and George Ade—good soldiers as well as star writers. In Smith's opinion there was never a better writer of news leads than George Ade. Of course Smith can't help mentioning other newspaper men of letters who worked in that old building on Wells Street which housed the Chicago Daily News.

Of course such men as William Cullen Bryant and John Greenleaf Whittier are not overlooked, to say nothing of such members of the working press as Frank Stockton, Charles Dudley Warner, Frank Norris, Ambrose Bierce, O. Henry, and "among the revolutionaries of a later period the dour features of Leon Trotzky."

he reaches the point where Smith sets forth the conclusion that the work of journalism and that of pure literature are irreconcilable. On this point Smith comments as follows:

A good deal of rhetoric has been spilled about the alleged kinship between literature and newspapers, but mostly, I fear, to little purpose. It is true that journalism may partake of the artistic motive. To the extent that it looks eagerly upon human life, seeking to perceive and to picture the tremendous facts of that tragedy, it parallels the efforts of sincere poets, fictionists, and historians. But when the research ends, and the report is to be made, the two methods, journalism and art, begin to diverge. Art selects; journalism completes. The newspaper offers "all that's fit to print," while literature retains only those facts essential to beauty, vigor, or harmony. It is useless, then, to expect great literature in your newspaper, except by what might be called a happy accident. It is equally vain—and has been proved so—to expect that men born to detect the great symbolisms in life, or men able to portray beauty in the abstract, or men to whom an original phrase is more important than a set of facts, shall be more than a perishable part of the newspaper edifice.

Here is something that Smith would like to have every reader underscore word by word:

Some of us, so long as we live, will never abandon the old-fashioned but thrilling idea that good writing for newspapers is worth while. We shall wag our grey beards furiously at every fancied opponent. We shall break our lances against every windmill.

We love fine, sincere, exceptional work, and we despise mediocrity. We hate with all our power of hatred every sort of easy, imitatve, complacent, patented, bunk-filled pseudo-literature, and we loath equally the conditions responsible and the men who teach that sort of writing. Rather than see our newspapers robbed of every incentive toward literary excellence, I would gladly help to dump the entire world supply of print paper into the nearest ocean. Rather than see all our honest and brilliant writers driven from the profession, I would yield the news-field to the radio and the Pathe Weekly.

Smith has another important point that he would like to offer:

Newspaper row would be a dull and unprofitable place if genius no longer glittered there. But such a time need never come. Should stone walls be built against the employment of the most promising, or the most noted men and women by newspapers, should there never again be a famous name on a newspaper pay-roll, there would remain genius of another sort—that authentic and not ignoble sort of genius which consists of an unerring sense of news values, a tremendous passion for collecting the great novelties of human life, combined with adequate talent for presenting them. Who will deny the label of "genius" to a Pulitzer or Dana, to whom newspaper work was the most glorious of careers? And similarly, what would be the justice, or the sense, of crying down that immense and constantly recruited army of newspaper people who never hope to be known by name, or to own even one share of stock in anything, or to have the happiness of publication with a brass band?

The conclusion of this comment may well be the concluding paragraphs of the booklet:

The newspaper business, despite the procession of occasional heroes, has no hall of fame. It has only "morgues," as we call our libraries, in which, spread across millions of unsigned pages, lie the embodied inspirations, the fugutive hopes and delights, the verbal inventions, the results of tireless research, to which an unmercenary and modest legion of men have given the best of their youth.

To men of their humor fame would be a nuisance, and wealth an anaesthetic. Nothing better can be done for them then to say, "Good work." And we try to attend to that. But it is not very often that a letter comes to a newspaper office praising an unsigned article; the applause of the public goes, here as everywhere, to the few who already have glory enough. I ask you to remember, along with the historically great on newspaper row, those others who exhibit, within very small circles, the greatness of loyalty, reticence, and devotion to reality.

HOUGHTON MIFFLIN COMPANY of Boston has just brought out an American edition of "The Truth About Publishing" by Stanley Unwin, one of the most successful of the younger book publishers in England. The preface to the American edition is contributed by Ferris Greenslet, who also scatters along through the text pungent editorial notes for the benefit of the American readers.

The volume, of course, limits itself to book publishing. But it is not without practical value for newspaper publishers, literary editors, and even leg men. Comprehensive in its mode of treatment, the volume is really a text-book of book production and publishing practices.

The volume opens with a chapter on "The Arrival of Manuscripts" and concludes with one on "Publishing as a Profession." In between are chapters dealing with estimating the cost, chief factors that determine the price, agreements with authors, preparation of the manuscript for printers, selling the books, publicity, and other aspects of the business. Of these chapters the one to be marked for special reading is Chapter VIII. This takes up the question of publicity. In speaking of blurbs, Mr. Unwin says that they must have news value if they are to attract the newspaper editor. What is said about review copies is right to the point, especially the selling of review copies after books have been reviewed in newspapers.

On the subject of newspaper advertising of books Mr. Unwin comments as follows:

The ordinary advertising expert is of very little assistance to the book publisher. On that point, at any rate, most publishers who have made the experiment of employing one will agree. The problems that the ordinary advertiser has to face are different in many essentials, as advertisement agents often discover for the first time when suddenly called upon to apply their expert knowledge to books. In the first place, there are very severe limits to what it is possible to spend on any one book, because the turnover of any one book is so limited. A publisher is dealing with pence where the seller of a staple commodity is dealing with pounds. Again, and this is a most important point, the demand for publishers' wares is seldom repetitive, like the demand which successful advertising can secure, for, let us say, soap or cigarettes. If "No. 13 soap" is actually found to be "unlucky for dirt," further tablets will be bought and used by the customer who has been induced to try the soap as a result of an advertising campaign. As a rule, one copy of a book satisfies the demand for the book on the part of the particular customer who has bought it, and (alas!) will probably also satisfy the demand of the many friends to whom he is sure to lend it. There is an added difficulty, and that is that we may nearly all be potential buyers of some particular brand of soap, but there are few books of where more than an infinitesimal fraction of the public can truthfully be regarded as potential purchasers.

Some newspaper offices are criticized for being incapable of setting a book advertisement decently. This is the part of the text that should be read by newspaper publishers. The general conclusion reached is that it pays to advertise a book if it shows signs of being successful without advertising. But it does not pay to use newspaper space at all extensively to advertise a book that shows no signs of catching on. Mr. Unwin uses the phrase "not extensively" because some advertising is strictly necessary to inform librarians, book sellers and others of the existence of the book.

Of course the volume was written not for newspaper publishers but for literary workers. If the latter read it they will be more sympathetic in their attitude toward book publishers.

THE UNION TRUST COMPANY of Cleveland puts out an interesting magazine known as Trade Winds. The current issue contains some plain words on advertising by D. W. Hall, secretary and treasurer of the Addressograph Company, whose article is headed "Taking the Bunk Out of Advertising."

The following quotation shows the general mode of treatment followed in the article:

Too many firms are just advertising, and they are apparently satisfied. One advertisement follows another, just as one hole follows another in golf. But how many business men do you see worrying and straining to make each advertisement accomplish something definite—bring in real returns—carry them forward without any wasted strokes to the next advertisement?

Another pungent comment made by Mr. Hall is:

In a nutshell, not enough money is being spent on advertising today—and too much money is being wasted.

Specific illustrations are given in the article but they are too long to quote. While the article in general contains a good deal of common sense, one can't entirely escape the feeling that even this article contains a little bunk. Fortunately this bunk is obvious to newspaper publishers.

THE pamphlet. "The Battle for a Free Press," contains the addresses by Frank B. Noyes, President of the Associated Press, and by Henry J. Allen, former governor of Kansas and a member of the Associated Press for the Wichita (Kan.) Beacon, delivered at the 27th annual meeting of the Associated Press held in New York in April. These addresses review the origin, history, and development of co-operative newsgathering in the United States. The one by President Noyes contains historical material not found elsewhere and makes a valuable contribution to the literature relating to the scrap between the Western Associated Press and the old United Press. The latter was an organization quite different from the association that today bears the same name. The address by former Governor Allen is less historical in character and deals with present day achievements of the Associated Press.

FAMOUS for its community service is the Janesville (Wis.) Daily Gazette. In the fall of 1922 it established its Community Service Department. One of the things it sponsored was the Good Times Club, an organization for boys and girls in rural and small town schools. At the close of 1926 this club had 280 school branches.

To supplement the work of the Daily Gazette in this field, Florence Slown Hyde, the Community Editor of the Daily Gazette, has compiled "The Good Times Club Recreation Manual for Home, School and Community." The title of the brochure sufficiently describes the contents.

In describing newspaper reading in the home Miss Hyde makes the following passing remark:

It is unfortunate that the newspaper reading of many children is confined to the comic supplement of the Sunday paper, and that many parents do not take into consideration the welfare of their children when bringing a newspaper into the home. If all children were given an opportunity and taught how to read with profit a good, clean daily newspaper, the doom of the sensational scandal purveying sheet would be sealed. The more general reading of the right kind of newspapers would result also in higher ideals of living and a more active and intelligent voting citizenship.

The brochure sells for $1 a copy and may be obtained from the Daily Gazette, Janesville, Wis. This is a ridiculously low price in view of the service it may render a newspaper by way of promoting extramural activities that link subscribers closer to the newspaper.

AN editorial in the New Republic—"The Magic Of Publicity"—tells how the public "which is nourished by the newspapers" responded to a wholesome impulse when it took such a spectacular interest in the transatlantic flight of Charles Lindbergh.

The general trend in mode of treatment is illustrated by the following quotation:

Of course, the outstanding individual who has been magically transformed by virtue of a single exploit is Lindbergh himself. The resulting publicity, which makes the life of the Prince of Wales look like that of a cloistered recluse, has wrought a miracle in him. His opinions, which in April would have had the commercial value of those of a thirty-dollar-a-week reporter, command for the moment more attention and a greater price than those of Lloyd George plus those of George Bernard Shaw. His salutation confers credit on great and time-honored things, just as Gloria Swanson confers credit on a cold cream by a testimonial in its favor. He somehow adds to the potentialities of the potentates whom he visits or the cities on which he descends or the Derbys which he patronizes.

SHOP TALK AT THIRTY

By MARLEN PEW

IT is always a pleasure to tell the world about Millie. For more than 20 years as a newspaper executive I have had faith in women to do reportorial jobs, and some desk jobs, as well if not better than men. Some women reporters I have known could do more to get for the paper what I wanted the paper to have than half a dozen pompous young males of the staff who ate up their energies in hard-boiled posing and were wont to look askance at the "sob-sister." Experience, therefore, gives me fine respect for newspaper women as a class and Millie was a particular genius.

MY reference is to Miss Mildred Morris, known to many newspaper people over the country and now, I believe, engaged in free lance magazine writing. Slight of figure, with a great mop of blazing red hair, nervous and temperamental, one would not select her to withstand the rigors of newspaper work, yet she possessed remarkable vitality. Her mind was throughly debunked and while she cultivated a bitter contempt for the world's shams and frauds and cried out against injustice in any form she had a delightful sense of humor and could not be held for cynicism. Her ability accurately to judge human nature at first glance was to me a revelation. Millie was never taken in by four-flushers and could scent a double-crosser from afar. She wrote a brilliant news story and her ability to cover any kind of assignment was nothing short of remarkable. She was at her best when allowed to take her own head on a story and her specialty was in scooping. Newspaper men feared her when she opposed them on a story, and not without reason.

ONE experience with Millie will convince shop talkers that she is a reporter extraordinary and one calculated to make a newspaper show signs of life. We sent Millie, one day, to a distant state to cover the trial of a woman charged with murder. It was a celebrated case. She had made friends with the defendant within a few hours after her arrival and in no time had induced her to write a "by-story" of excellent value. For two or three weeks Millie flooded us with copy, covering the case with distinction and against the competition of two or three men assigned to the job by rivals. After she had cleaned the story up shipshape Millie journeyed on to another state where another woman was about to be tried in a notorious murder case. An alleged confession was in the hands of the district attorney. No newspaper had had it. Millie made friends with the aged judge who was to hear the case and through him arranged to get a copy of the alleged confession, giving it publicity for the first time. She covered the hearing unaided, with first-class stories, and I have heard that part of the time she sat with the judge on the bench during the trial. She announced, correctly, the verdict several minutes before the jury had returned to the court-room to report its finding. I assure my readers that Millie would not have flashed this news unless she had known what the verdict would be. There would be no question about it. She could always wait to get things right. It was a long and exhausting trial and Millie was advised to take a vacation and for several days she dropped out of sight, but presently wired that, through her friend the judge, she had made the acquaintance of a famous physician who could tell the story of how he had kept John D. Rockefeller in good health for more than half a century. We took in the story and it proved to be a health article that any editor would take pleasure in giving a place on page one. Millie returned to the office next day with another suggestion. She had received from the doctor an introduction to Mr. Rockefeller. Within a few days Millie had produced an excellent interview with the aged millionaire. In my newspaper experience I have never known man or woman reporter who could compete with Miss Morris in the gentle art of making friends among interesting people and inducing them to yield what a newspaper wants from such people, not what such people want newspapers to yield to them. She would not accept confidences. It was well understood that her calls were for the purpose of writing what she could find out.

AFTER all an editor wants a maker of good copy, whether man or woman, and good copy makers are not common, all statements to the contrary notwithstanding. The newspaper women I have known seemed more intent upon delivering copy than is the average man, and in instances more competent to write good copy, at least on certain subjects. Many women take to daily journalism with astonishing ease. I well recall one occasion when a woman who had never had newspaper experience came to my office and told of her domestic plight. Her husband, who had been a member of our staff, had ruined his life with booze and had dragged his family to intolerable poverty. The wife had arrived at the decision that she must be the provider and sought advice. Could she write? She had lived in a newspaper atmosphere but had never turned a line of copy. She would make a stab at it if I would give her the opportunity. We needed a woman to conduct our woman's page. As this woman was an expert housekeeper, good wife and mother, I thought she qualified as an expert, but the question was whether she could express herself in print and pick up the technique of page making. She would try, and for two weeks we drilled her in the work. Because she possessed fine ideas and practical experience in domestic science and was extraordinarily intelligent she quickly caught on and within a month or two was making the best page we had ever had—a page our readers praised to the skies. This newspaper woman, in a few years, had gained a national reputation, her stuff being syndicated to many papers.

THE "sob-sister" slur has gone too far in newspaper circles. No newspaper has ever lost anything by the publication of sympathetic human-interest stuff and the women who produce such material should not labor under this insult. If one were to count the good deeds of the newspaper press the achievements of women writers would stand near the top. Very unjustly women have never received proper recognition or compensation in journalism and the opprobrium of the hard-boiled brotherhood is not only in poor taste but distinctly unfair. A newspaper which does not show the touch of a woman's hand is like home without mother.

BERRY PAPERS REPORT

British Group Shows New Profit of £335,753 for 1926

(Special to Editor & Publisher)

London, June 4.—Profits of Allied Newspapers, London and Manchester, England, were reported to be less than those of 1925 by £77,570 at the annual meeting on May 24. The chairman, Sir William Berry, said he considered this figure eminently satisfactory, having regard to the troublous times of last year.

The sum of £250,000 was placed to general reserve, which means that, including last year's trading, a total of £776,647 has been placed to reserve account in three years' trading, which, with the sum of £116,106 carried forward, equals nearly 45 per cent of the ordinary share capital.

Adding to the profits for the year the sum of £102,352 carried forward from the previous year and deducting the interest on debentures, preference dividend, and interim ordinary dividend of 5 per cent, there remained £358,106. A final dividend of 7 per cent is to be paid on the ordinary shares, making 12 per cent for the year.

Net profits for the year, after deducting debenture and preference interest, amounted to £335,753.

PRICE LEAVES DAILY TO OPEN STUDIO

Editor & Publisher's Photographer Resigns from New York World to Go Into Busines for Himself —His Long Career

Jack Price has resigned from the photographic staff of the New York World to open his own studio in the Salmon Tower Building, New York. Mr. Price is the staff photographer of Editor & Publisher, and will continue this work.

His new venture will be operated under the name of Price Studios, Inc., and it will also have a department run as the Jack Price Photo News Service, handling special assignments for New York and out-of-town newspapers.

In the last 20 years during which Mr. Price has been a news photographer, he has photographed scores of famous people. He is credited with being the first New York newspaper cameraman to persuade the camera shy John D. Rockefeller to have his picture taken. Mr. Price took the picture, but had to attend church with Mr. Rockefeller before he was granted the permission. He has been particularly congratulated for the successful pictures he took of President Wilson and President Taft.

Mr. Price was one of the first newspaper photographers to take pictures from an airplane. He was in two 'plane crashes, and in one of them was painfully injured.

How to Simplify your Sales Problem in the South

A great deal of merchandise distributed in the South is still sold thru the jobbers located in the important cities. These jobbers travel their salesmen thruout their entire territory, who call on dealers in the remotest sections, never visited by the advertiser's representatives.

The large southern city newspapers have both city and country wide circulation—and follow the footsteps of the jobbers men in the smallest rural sections.

The National Advertiser who distributes his product thru the southern jobber—by advertising in the city newspapers, can enlist the aid of the jobbers salesmen to push his product with the dealers. At the same time his advertising message circulates in the homes of the city and suburban families.

Concentrate on the New South where earning and buying power is increasing daily—the country's fastest growing market.

QUALITY SEEN BASIS FOR ADS

Expert Terms, "Kind, Not Number," of Subscribers Leading Factor in Success

Mere multitude of circulation does not constitute a sure guide for the advertiser looking for a sale for his products, it is the "right kind of patrons" that counts, declared O. C. Harn, managing director of the Audit Bureau of Circulation, at the convention of Association of National Advertisers in the Hotel Statler yesterday.

"I am very glad the question of quality circulation is being raised," said Mr. Harn, "for we have been passing through a distressing era of indiscriminate buying. Circulations of newspapers and magazines have been infected, with no attendant increase in value, but with decided increase in the cost of advertising.

"You advertisers have but yourselves to blame. Publishers do not want to perpetrate this uneconomic thing, but you force them to do it when they find that you select your list of media from the newspapers solely on the factor of having the largest circulation in the town.

"Make the publishers sell you the elements of their circulation. Don't be afraid to buy the smaller circulation if the indications are it has a larger proportion of the right kind of patrons."

MR. HARN points out that the whole is no greater than the sum of the parts.

And he says it is necessary to find out specifically what the elements in a circulation are, which make up the total figures.

People who read the best buy the best.

Newspapers which print exclusive dispatches written by the best writers obtainable in sports, politics, business, finance, and foreign news, have prima facie evidence of their appeal to the "best element."

The Consolidated Press Association is supplied to a group of dominating newspapers which appreciate quality-in-quantity and print the best because they have the kind of readers who demand it.

C. P. A. dispatches can be successfully merchandised because they "go where money is."

Typographical Standards Give added Value to Advertising in

The New York Times

NATIONAL ADVERTISERS have declared that newspaper typographical reform is first among problems to be solved. The New York Times was a pioneer in the adoption of typographical standards. More than a score of important newspapers have adopted The Times standards in whole or in part.

The Times standards provide typographical protection for intelligently planned advertising—and thereby greater productiveness. The purpose of The Times standards is to insure the most attractive newspaper printing possible. The Times incurs an expense to itself of $100,000 a year in the remaking of cuts to achieve its ideal of printing.

A "Manual of Typographical Standards" prepared and published by The Times is now on the press. It is a book of the greatest usefulness to all interested in newspaper advertising production. The price is $1.50. Orders should be sent to The Times Advertising Production Department.

Advertising Compass Swings to Denver As I. A. A. Gathers For 23rd Meeting

essions Will Open Sunday With Inspirational Gathering—Senator Borah Chief Convention Speaker —Advertising's Part in Industry Theme of Four-Day Meet

JNDER the ghostly patronage of "The Man with the Banner," a prehistoric ıdian trader in the pottery of the olorado pueblo dwellers who is claimed y the Denver Advertising Club as America's first advertising man," the osts of the International Advertising .ssociation will meet for their 23d anual convention in Denver from June 26 › June 29.

Denver will put on its convention uniorm—the thirteen-quart Stetson—and opes that everybody else will follow the ashion while the convention program peeds through three days and nights of igh-pressure business with an entertainent schedule that doesn't overlap the usiness sessions, but fills all the interices the business sessions overlooked. nd, of course, Denver always has Pike's eak, and Long's Peak and a hulking, ıouldering army of Rocky Mountain ıammoths calculated to make the Eastner revise his idea that the Woolworth uilding is the highest peak on earth. enver also has a $10,000,000 civic ntre, within easy walking distance of ıe convention hotels, with a Greek ıeatre in which the opening inspirational ssion of the convention will be held unday evening.

And, as the first paragraph hinted, enver has the relics of the first Adversing man in America and will emblazon s token on the official convention badge. s Denver tells the story:

"Thirty centuries ago there flourished the craggy land of southwestern olorado a people now known vaguely as ıe 'basket makers.' They lived and rished and were well nigh forgotten fore the cliff dwellers established emselves and, passing in their time, left hind the prehistoric ruins of the Mesa erde. They made a crude pottery which ıtedates the decorated bowls and ewers the later cultures. They discovered ıd dug turquoise and fashioned the gems to picturesque jewelry. Jet, really a illiant lignite, was used in their coarse ıd unrefined ornaments. They made basts and grew corn. They lived between e period of the discovery of fire and e time of iron.

"Into their ancient pueblos came visirs from the south, bringing the bright athers of the macaw and branches of lm. And one day there arrived a ıder who had found his way from the est, across the wilderness and desert that ancient day, to barter sea shells r their turquoise and jet.

"High on a rocky wall in La Sal canon ere still stands the sign manual he ined—the awkward figure of 'The Man ith the Banner.' It was notice to the sket-makers that he had come to exange his wares for theirs.

'So goes the story as archaeologists d ethnologists have reconstructed it. d in its support the Advertising Club Denver will exhibit in the Hall of spitality the shells of abalone and ella, which could only have come from what is now the California coast, but which were found deep in the prehistoric ruins of the Mesa Verde, where only the basket-makers could have placed them. And with these evidences of primitive commerce will be displayed the turquoise and jet, the food bowls, the baskets and, not the least interesting, a photograph of 'The Man With the Banner' himself."

LEARNING THE FACTS ABOUT ADVERTISING ASSOCIATION'S NEXT URGENT DUTY

By C. K. WOODBRIDGE, President

International Advertising Association

Vice-President, Electric Refrigeration Corporation, Detroit

HE Internatonal Advertising Association has put its financial affairs in good order after the period of re-adjustment through which we have passed in our new relations with the vigilance activities of organized advertising which are now carried on under the direction of the National Better Business Bureau.

C. K. Woodbridge

By that I mean, that though we experienced some temporary falling off of revenue while we were getting our affairs readjusted to meet new conditions, we end the year with a surplus after paying all bills, and the organization is ready now to devote its entire attention to a program of research and education, leaving it to the National Better Business Bureau which the Association so successfully established and with which it now retains a valuable affiliation, to carry on the corrective work.

There is a great opportunity ahead for this Association to do a tremendously constructive work to meet the needs of modern business for more facts about advertising. These should be gathered by a trained staff from the many sources with which our numerous affiliations bring us into contact, and made available under proper direction and authority of our executive officers and committees to those who are seeking authoritative information, properly coordinated.

At our Denver convention this month I shall present a comprehensive statement covering the major developments of our work over the past two years in which I have held the office as President; also, I shall present certain recommendation as to the future.

I am convinced that this great organization of ours has almost limitless opportunities for service and I find men on all sides who share that view. I know of no organization that has done a more constructive work in the short span of twenty odd years, but there is much more to be done.

It has been a great pleasure to me personally to head the organization as President through this important period in its development. I am deeply appreciative of the generous support of our good friends in the newspaper publishing field.

The Association will need even more liberal support if it is to measure up to its larger opportunities of service in making the uses of advertising better understood by the advertiser, its value even more generally recognized, and the consumer a more efficient buyer.

But though ancient symbols furnish inspiration, the convention program committee, headed by E. D. Gibbs, kept their product upon strictly a modern plane.

The theme of the convention will be the growth of industry and the part that advertising plays in its development. It was the original intention to have speakers representing other of the great industries of this country, but the committee, according to Mr. Gibbs, feared "that we might overdo this, so we concluded to select some speakers who would give a lighter touch to the program."

"Joe Mitchell Chapple is one of these," Mr. Gibbs continued. "Joe has won fame as an orator and rightly so. He has knowledge, experience and a broad imagination plus the ability to express his thoughts. "Dr. J. Whitcomb Brougher, who is featured for the Sunday inspirational meeting to deliver a talk on 'Service and Success,' is one of the most brilliant and constructive thinkers and speakers of our country.

"Mrs. Emily Newell Blair—the only woman speaker on the general program—has a national reputation as a speaker.

"One of the newest and greatest novelties is the telephotograph, by which messages, pictures and advertisements are reproduced over the telephone wires. W. E. Harkness, who is in charge of this work of the American Telephone & Telegraph Company, will describe the use of this process and exhibit many interesting pictures.

"We have in Senator Borah, who will address the convention on Tuesday night, a man who is universally recognized as a great statesman and a wonderful orator. The subject of his address will be 'Business and the Government.'

"Because of the extraordinary interest in aviation and the enthusiasm aroused by the wonderful feats of Col. Lindbergh and Clarence Chamberlin and Charles Levine, Col. Paul Henderson's talk on 'The Wings of Business' will be one of the most timely and interesting addresses of any of those that are scheduled.

"The Program Committee, in its desire to emphasize industrial growth and the use of advertising in connection with it, considered it highly important to have some distinguished speaker make a talk on community work and community advertising. When we sent word that this subject was to be handled, we received telegrams and letters urging us to secure Mayor James Rolph, Jr., of San Francisco.

"Another great industrial development is that of public utilities. It is a subject which affects all of us. James F. Owens of Oklahoma City will handle this important subject.

"Another industry which represents a phenomenal growth is that of radio and Merlin Hall Aylesworth, president of the National Broadcasting Company, was our choice for this talk. He has selected as his subject, 'The Romance of Radio.'

DENVER'S HAND RAISED HIGH IN SALUTE TO ENVOYS OF ADVERTISING

By J. E. MOORHEAD

President-Elect Advertising Club of Denver and General Convention Chairman

THE convention which may prove to be a turning point in the career of organized advertising probably will also mark a turning point in the city which is to be its host. Denver, already widely known as a resort, proposes to offer for the inspection of the masters of American marketing its remarkable facilities as a distribution center for the intermountain trade territory. Denver sees in this convention far more than a grateful opportunity to play host to friendly thousands; the city believes its guests form a master group which will in good time point the way to industrial expansion and well deserved commercial development for this intermountain capital.

Denver is ready for its guests. There will be no last minute confusion. The city accepts the challenge which the unrivalled hospitality of past host cities has placed before her. Denver is ready to have her advertising friends test her capacity for generous welcome.

As president-elect of the Advertising Club of Denver I anticipate such a thrust of enthusiasm as a result of this convention that the club and organized advertising in this territory will go forward to fuller and finer achievements in the year to come.

great industries, but probably the greatest one, because we are dependent upon it for our very existence. One of the most famous agricultural experts of America —Ex-Governor S. R. McKelvie, of Nebraska—will paint a picture of the development of agriculture and what it means to us as individuals.

"Inasmuch as every industry, without exception, is dependent upon proper financial support, the talk that will be made by Francis H. Sisson, of New York, on 'Problems of Prosperity' will be a most important feature of the convention proceedings.

The convention, as already stated, will be confined to three business days instead of the usual four days. An important innovation will be the holding of two great meetings Monday and Tuesday evenings, Wednesday evening being devoted to entertainment.

High spots of the business and entertainment program follow:

Sunday Afternon, June 26—Inspirational Meeting, Greek Theater, Denver Civic Center.

Monday Morning, June 27—General Session, Orpheum Theater.

Monday Afternoon—Departmental Sessions.

Monday Night—General Session, Orpheum Theater or Municipal Auditorium.

Tuesday Morning, June 28—General Session, Orpheum Theater.

Tuesday Afternoon—Departmental Sessions.

Tuesday Night—General Session, Orpheum Theater or Municipal Auditorium.

Wednesday, June 29—Departmental Sessions, Morning and Afternoon.

Wednesday Night—Western Baile at Municipal Auditorium.

Thursday, June 30—Golf Tournaments and Post-convention Tours.

Annual meeting of the International Advertising Association at Orpheum Theater, at 4 p. m., Wednesday Afternoon, June 29.

Annual meeting of the Advertising Commission at the Hotel Cosmopolitan, Monday noon, June 27.

Club Officers' Conference all day Wednesday, June 29.

Special Entertainment for Visiting Ladies Daily.

Dress—Summer clothes for Denver. Light overcoats will be needed for mountain wear.

Convention Information Booth in Hall of Hospitality, Hotel Cosmopolitan.

The Wednesday night "Western Baile," it might be said for the benefit of tenderfeet (or is it tenderfoots) will be Denver's idea of how the annual convention grand ball should be conducted. Details of this entertainment are being kept a deep secret by the committee in charge.

Following the convention, the delegates will have their choice of 77 tours into the scenic wonderland of Colorado. The cost, it is said, will range from $5 to $160, the latter being the fare over the "grand circle" tour. Many no doubt will find their way to Colorado Springs and its well known "Garden of the Gods" and other points of interest in the Rockies before returning to their homes.

CARROLL TO RETIRE AS A. N. A. E. CHIEF

Has Served Four Terms as President of Ad Managers Group—Outlines Achievements of Organization During Past Year

Frank T. Carroll, president of the Association of Newspaper Advertising Executives and advertising director of the Indianapolis News, will not be a candidate to succeed himself as A. N. A. E. president at the annual meeting of the group, to be held in Denver, July 26-29, in connection with the annual convention of the International Advertising Association, he stated this week. Friends have urged him to allow his name to be offered for reelection, but he has declined. He has served four terms, beginning in June, 1923.

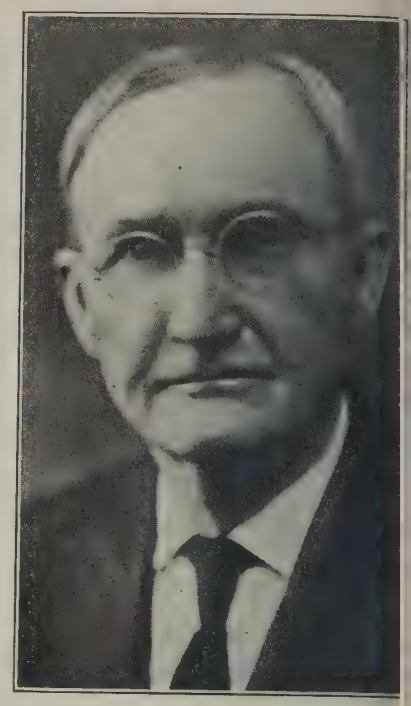
F. T. Carroll

An outline of the achievements of the A. N. A. E. during the past year, prepared by Mr. Carroll for presentation at the Denver meeting, follows in part:

1. Arrangements were made whereby newspaper advertising was the subject of addresses before advertising and service clubs in more than 100 American cities during the week of January 17.

2. Arrangements have been made with a recognized authority to publish a textbook on newspaper advertising. Copy is now in process of preparation.

3. The Idea Exchange Committee has been reorganized to provide numerous revenue building plans.



4. A program is being carried out to encourage syndicate mat services to produce high-grade art work and to curtail the use of pronounced black areas, borders and other objectionable devices.

5. A detailed survey of the merchandising service problem was conducted and the results sent to each member. Reprints were also mailed generally to national advertisers, advertising agencies and non-member newspapers, in order to help standardize both the demands for service and the service policies.

6. A survey was conducted covering the cost to sell and handle local display, national display, classified and total advertising. The report also covered average net rates received from each division of advertising. This valuable information was given to the membership.

7. The A. of N. A. E. has continued to grow until the membership now includes 316 newspapers.

A. B. C. RULE ON RETURN COPIES TO BE REPEALED

Long Standing Controversy on Five Per Cent Regulation Near Settlement, Harn Tells I. C. M. A.—Harold Hough of Ft. Worth Elected President

By PHILIP SCHUYLER

(By Telegraph to EDITOR & PUBLISHER)

ATLANTA, Ga., June 23.—Harold Hough, circulation director and treasurer of the Fort Worth (Tex.) Star-Telegram and Record, was unanimously elected president of the International Circulation Managers' Association at the closing session of the Association's 29th annual convention held at the Atlanta-Biltmore here this week from Tuesday until Thursday. He was elected first vice-president at Philadelphia last year, and now succeeds Charles Payne, Indianapolis Times, at the head of the organization.

Only 38 years old, Mr. Hough is one of the youngest circulation managers of the country ever to head the International group. He has been a circulation manager in Fort Worth for the last 12 years, coming there from the Oklahoma City Daily Oklahoman and Times.

O. C. Harn, managing director of the Audit Bureau of Circulations, this week revealed to members of the International Circulation Managers Association that the board of directors of the A. B. C. had voted to repeal the old five per cent ruling, long a cause of debate between the believers in full returns and partisans of non-returns.

Official announcement of the repeal, he said, awaited action of the newspaper advisory committee, members of which had told him they considered the board's action satisfactory.

In an exclusive statement to EDITOR & PUBLISHER, Mr. Harn said:

"The so-called 5 per cent rule, headed in the printed rules as 'dealers' unsold copies' has been repealed by the board of directors, subject, before formal announcement and putting into effect, to reference to the newspaper advisory committee for the opinion of that committee's members."

Mr. Harn explained that on formal adoption of the repeal, bureau auditors would be instructed simply to get the facts on returns or non-returns. He said that he had no opinions as to whether one system was better than an other, and that the bureau was only concerned in making sure that the newspapers were charging advertisers only on a basis of actually giving them what they paid for. He described the five per cent rule as "unworkable because of necessary ambiguities."

Mr. Harn made his announcement Wednesday following an address by M. W. Halmbacher of the Oklahoma City Oklahoman and Times, who denounced the 5 per cent rule. The session immediately developed into a hot debate between advocates of full returns and non-returns from dealers. O. V. Fragstein, Milwaukee Journal, was champion of the former system, while Halmbacher and H. W. Stodghill, Louisville Courier-Journal, stood up for the latter. Stodghill said that the non-returnable system was started during the war period on federal order to conserve print paper. He said the need to conserve newsprint was still at hand. Acceptance of full returns he characterized as a wasteful practice, the expense of the unsold copies often being borne by advertisers.

John Schmid, director of circulation of the Hearst newspapers, predicted that "whatever the A. B. C., does all newspapers will in a very short time go on a fully returnable basis."

Fragstein said that without returns advertisers frequently are made to pay for circulation they do not actually receive. He said a system of paid agents, strict supervision with heavy penalties prevented dealers from cheating publishers by returning copies of the paper that actually had been sold to readers. Newspapers sometimes forced agents to increase the draw when no returns were allowed, either making the dealer pay the bill or paying bonuses to compensate the dealer, he said.

"I advocate a ruling by the A. B. C. making full returns compulsory, or at least inserting a clause in the bureaus report for papers not allowing returns to read in effect: 'this paper on non-returnable basis, therefore total net paid circulation is not ascertainable.'"

J. R. Marks, Asheville Citizen, read a code of ethics adopted by the Carolina Circulation Managers Association, and urged similar action by I. C. M. A. No action was taken before EDITOR & PUBLISHER went to press.

Harold Hough

In an interview with EDITOR & PUBLISHER immediately after his election Mr. Hough declared his chief concern as president would be to get circulation managers all over the country interested in increasing rates to subscribers, particularly those in rural districts.

"We are selling our papers too cheaply," he said. "If circulation managers are interested, as they should be, in saving money for their publishers, adjustment of rates upwards to obtain more money from rural subscribers is a more important problem than postal rates.

"Many newspapers, particularly those in cities of 200,000 or under, are giving their country readers city service now with no advance in charges. Such practices are costing newspapers dearly, since to give the service demanded, expensive motor routes are being installed everywhere.

"Farmers once content to receive their papers by rural mail delivery now want morning papers before breakfast on the day of publication and evening papers on the same day before supper. Very few are paying for this extra service and they should."

Of outstanding importance at this convention were addresses of O. C. Harn, new managing director of the Audit Bureau of Circulations, and E. W. Chandler, chief auditor. Mr. Harn's address is carried in detail on another page of this issue.

Described as of vital importance to I. C. M. A. members was the subject of returns as interpreted by the A. B. C. This matter was brought up before the convention on Wednesday morning by M. W. Halmbacher of the Oklahoma City Oklahoman and Times.

Mr. Halmbacher asked the questions, "Are newspapers slipping back into the practice of returns?" and "Are the accounting methods of the A. B. C. responsible?"

In developing his theme he quoted returns from a questionnaire first made public at the last meeting of the A. B. C. by E. K. Gaylord, president of the Oklahoman and Times, and printed at that time by EDITOR & PUBLISHER. He continued Mr. Gaylord's attack on the Bureau's ruling on left-overs and unsold copies.

Mr. Halmbacher argued that it was difficult to determine the exact difference between an agent and a dealer as promulgated by the Bureau.

"The A. B. C. contends," he said "that in order to be a dealer you must conduct a newstand, sell papers, and make your delivery. A dealer is not permitted to employ carriers or newsboys. If the dealers adhere strictly to these rules he is so classed by the A. B. C. and the publisher is then entitled to claim as paid circulation left-overs and unsold copies, so long as they do not exceed five per cent of the total drawn."

The speaker cited several illustrations from his own records of the confusion caused by this ruling, which he described as ridiculous.

"The Oklahoman and Times," he said, "have approximately 800 distributors, part of whom would be classed under the A. B. C. ruling as dealers and part as agents. There is no living man who would able to know how many of these distributors are strictly dealers, and given the five per cent left-over privilege and how many are agents, and what percentage we should deduct for circulation supplied to agents.

"When the A. B. C. considers only circulation that is bought by the reader, and eliminates the five per cent clause, they do away with surplus circulation and cheap flat rates, and afford publishers a wide open protection. Publishers will then be on an equal basis. The advertiser will receive dollar for dollar for that which he pays and to which he is justly entitled."

A new A. B. C. problem was injected into the meeting. Answering a question, E. W. Chandler, chief auditor, said it seemed inevitable that there would have to be a new classification in the report to care for motor route lists.

Mr. Chandler also explained the clubbing offer rule that goes into effect July 1, warning circulators that they would be caught if they tried to beat the barrier by putting through a lot of orders under the old rule on June 29.

It seemed certain as the convention drew to a close that fellow officers with Hough, now president, would be J. N. Annenberg, Curtis-Martin Newspapers, first vice-president and in line for the presidency in 1928, James Mathews, St. Paul Pioneer Press and Dispatch, second vice-president, and Clarence Eyster, Peoria Star, re-elected secretary and treasurer.

A note was read from Robert Weir, now seriously ill in Detroit, and the convention telegraphed its regrets that he was unable to be present. Weir was one of the founders of the association.

Thomas Dowling, circulation director of the Scripps-Howard Newspapers who is now stationed at New York on the Evening Telegram, told delegates of the ending of the circulation war in Cleveland.

"Cleveland papers spent about $1,250,000 on premium contests and other similar circulation stunts last year," he said, "and it was about time a halt was called. Strangely enough there has been very little falling off in circulation since the publishers recently agreed to discontinue forced promotion.

"Now that the newspaper Santa Claus has packed his bag and left Cleveland the circulation managers there are glad of it. They have been giving away automobiles and houses and lots for subscriptions long enough. Now they are sour on this kind of circulation promotion."

As far as New York was concerned, Mr. Dowling said he thought the Telegram should put Ruth Snyder, Judd Gray and Col. Charles Lindbergh on the payroll.

"This trio put us over in New York," said Mr. Dowling. "We have put on 30,000 circulation since the Snyder-Gray trial."

Incidentally it became known at the convention that Mr. and Mrs. Dowling are parents of a daughter, Madeline, born eight weeks ago. They have another girl, Mary Elizabeth, who is two.

John M. Schmid, director of circulation for the Hearst newspapers with headquarters in Chicago, also said Col. Lindbergh was responsible for phenomenal increases in newspaper circulation. Other circulators suggested a vote of thanks to the daring airman.

The new president of the group, Harold Hough, is very popular among members of the Association. They tell how he started work at 16 as a route boy on the Oklahoma City Oklahoman and in six years worked up to the position of assistant circulation manager. He had been a newsboy only a year when, while selling papers at the railroad station, he was in an accident and lost his right foot. Since then he has been an earnest advocate of newsboy welfare.

"Newsboys don't want charity, they want a square deal," he declared at this convention.

"Give him as good a corner as he deserves and protect his rights after you have given it to him."

Soon after he had been made assistant circulation manager of the Oklahoman, Hough decided he wanted to hold the title job himself and saw little chance for advancement in Oklahoma City. He heard that the circulation manager of the Fort Worth Star-Telegram was leaving and immediately wrote Amon G. Carter, the publisher, a letter, although he did not know him.

"Don't hire any circulation manager, I'm coming for the job," he wrote, telling Mr. Carter why he held that opinion.

"Nobody sent for you," said Mr. Carter when two days later Mr. Hough arrived in his office, in Fort Worth.

"Well, I'm the guy you want," the young Oklahoman countered.

"You'll have to show me," said Mr. Carter.

Hough did show the Star-Telegram what he could do for it. When he first came to Fort Worth the circulation of the paper was 19,000 now it is more than 100,000. Two years ago he was taken into the firm and made treasurer.

The circulation increase, according to Hough was made without contests or premiums.

"Each year," he said, "we do conduct a direct mail subscription campaign holding what we call bargain days for subscriptions in December. We cut our rate from $10 to $7.45 and usually average about 32,000 paid in advance subscriptions from this one stunt annually."

Mr. Hough is a past president of the Texas Circulation Managers' Association. He became widely known throughout the Southwest, when, under the name of "The Hired Hand" he was announcer for the Star-Telegrams radio broadcasting station. He enjoyed this job as a sideline until people began to find out who the Hired Hand was. Now he is beginning to give it up gradually.

HARN DISCUSSES PREMIUMS BEFORE I. C. M. A.

Audit Bureau Director Says Publishers Should Let Advertisers Know All the Facts Concerning Bargain Offers—Urges Spirit of A. B. C. Rules Be Observed If Harmony Is to Prevail

Following, in part, is the text of an address made by O. C. Harn, managing director of the Audit Bureau of Circulations, before the annual convention of the International Circulation Managers Association in Atlanta, Ga., this week.

BEFORE I begin allow me to assure you that, while I may assume the role of a friendly critic, I distinctly reject the role of complainer, scolder or pessimist. On the contrary, I feel that what is being done today is highly creditable. I believe that, on the whole, you publishers are meeting the issues as they arise squarely and in good spirit. If there is failure anywhere, it looks to me as if it were due to two things: first, to misunderstanding of the rules adopted, and second, to a lack of keen apprehension of the inevitable interdependence existing among yourselves—or, to put it in another way, the general effect which the act of one may have on the welfare of the whole. This keener sensitiveness will come; indeed, it is growing all the time.

It is with the idea, therefore, of pointing out our future logical pathway, not of criticizing our present, that I shall discuss some things which I believe will be interesting and profitable.

In the first place, let me clear the atmosphere of possible misunderstandings by restating what has been said many times but which will bear repetition, namely, that the work of the Audit Bureau has nothing whatever to do with opinions or judgments as to what is good circulation or poor circulation. It has no hostility to any plan or method which a publisher may see fit to adopt in order to increase his circulation. It has no opinion as to circulation secured by such methods. The Bureau's function is not to say what you shall do or shall not do, in the selection of these methods, but simply to set forth as clearly as it can what you have done.

The Audit Bureau does not presume to say whether or not what the publisher offers to the advertiser is "a good buy" or not. The Bureau discharges its full duty when it tells the buyer clearly what the offer is.

Keeping in mind, therefore, that the only function of the Audit Bureau is to help the buyer and seller to come together on a frank basis of full knowledge of the facts involved in the purchase and the sale, what can members do to enable the Bureau to increase the effectiveness of that service?

In the first place, I should say that the chief thing for us all is to acquire a more thorough and more acute recognition of the fundamental purpose of the thing we are doing. This is all important. The rules of procedure adopted by the Bureau are nothing more nor less than the expression of what is considered at the time of adoption the best way to arrive at and set forth the facts which are to be the basis of the sale of the circulation to the advertiser. If every member, in making his reports to the Bureau, would say to himself: "How can I best meet the spirit of the rule?" instead of "How far can I go and still stay within the technical letter of the rule?" a decided advance would immediately be made.

I can make my meaning clear, I think, by a few illustrations.

The giving of premiums is a recognized method of inducing people to subscribe to a publication—all kinds of publications, newspapers, magazines, farm papers, business publications. Some people think it is an entirely wicked procedure; others believe it to be perfectly legitimate. Let us look into it.

In the first place, it seems perfectly obvious that we cannot interest a person in a paper by talking to him about something else—a jacknife, a book, or a cooking utensil. If the collateral articles does influence the purchase of the paper, it must be for an entirely different reason. The reason, of course, is the appeal to the bargain instinct.

If, then, a sale of the paper plus the merchandise is made when the paper could not have been sold alone at its regular price, another question must next be asked. What is the attitude of the purchaser toward each of the two things he has bought, the paper and the premium?

If the only question involved were the sale of two items, the paper and the premium, this question need not be asked. But we must keep in mind always that the taking of subscriptions to a paper with a premium attached is an entirely different matter from the selling of a case of soap with a premium attached. In the latter instance, the soap manufacturer simply wishes to sell his soap at a profit and when he has done so the transaction is closed. In selling the paper the transaction has just begun. There is another factor vitally interested—the advertiser. The publisher in making the sale of the paper has not made a profit. If he stopped there, he would go broke. He has just laid the foundation for his profit. He expects to realize on the transaction by later selling to some advertiser the reader he has just secured. If, therefore, he honestly wants to sell to the advertiser what he pretends to sell him, it is absolutely essential that he satisfy himself that he has really added a reader to his subscription list and not merely a name and address.

Accordingly, in order to satisfy ourselves of the legitimacy of a premium subscription, we must inquire as to the probably attitude of the purchaser. It would appear evident that if the premium given is such as to seem a bargain to the purchaser at the combination price, even if he left the paper entirely out of consideration, then there could be no assumption of any interest in the paper. If, on the other hand, the price of the combination is the full price of the paper plus the known or apparent full value of the premium, then the purchaser has certainly expressed a desire for both the paper and the premium

True enough, you say, but no one ever sells a combination that way. There would be no point to that. All right; I have mentioned the two extremes of the possible use of premiums, in order to get at the principles. The Audit Bureau's definition of a paid subscription is one which has been taken at not less than one-half of the regular price. In other words, it has been held that the bargain instinct may be appealed to within a certain degree without necessarily losing the essential thing which the publisher is going to sell later to the advertiser, namely, reader interest. But, recognizing also that some advertisers, and some publishers also, look upon this question of how much a subscriber is willing to pay as an essential guide in judging the probable degree of reader interest, the Bureau sets forth the facts as to the extent of the cut made in price.

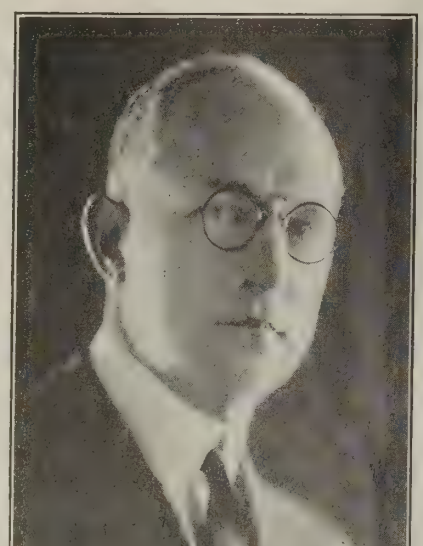
When it comes to premiums, the same principle has been followed and the rule is that, if the full value of the premium plus at least one-half the regular price of the paper is collected, then the subscriber has exhibited a definite desire for the paper, as well as for the premium, and the order is considered a paid subscription.

Now, the principle having been agreed to, that, in taking subscriptions in connection with premiums, we must be satisfied that the subscriber, in spite of the premium, has registered a definite desire for the paper, the publisher should render every assistance possible in establishing that reader interest. He should not take advantage of every technicality in order to qualify as many of these names as possible, regardless of what conclusion a common-sense view of the situation would lead a reasonable person to take. If we are guided by the spirit of the rule instead of by its technicalities, we will not try to make the premium loom as large as possible in the mind of the prospective subscriber at the time of the sale and then minimize it so far as possible when making out our report to the advertiser.

Let me illustrate the difference in the attitudes which might be taken. Supposing I pick up a bargain in a job lot of fountain pens. They are handsome and look like pens for which the public is accustomed to pay $5. I put no price on them, knowing full well that the prospective subscriber will establish the value in his own mind unaided. I offer a term subscription to my paper, regular price $2, and the pen for $2. I argue that it should pass muster, on the ground that the pen cost me only $1, which, added to 50 per cent of the regular price of my paper, $1, makes up the $2 whi the subscriber paid.

The actual state of mind of the su scriber may be quite different. He se a fountain pen which looks to be worth and a paper worth $2, total $7 fered to him for $2. He snaps up wh seems to be a bargain, with little co sideration as to whether he wants t paper or not.

Shouldn't the publisher, who wishes deal frankly with his advertiser on t 20th-century basis, take pains to ha him know all the facts and let him dra his conclusions, rather than endeavor conceal them? I really believe that the spirit of the premium rule were a ways frankly followed, the strenuous o jection which so many advertisers a many publishers have to premium-bu circulation would largely disappear.



Take another case of a different kin Everybody agrees that papers printed b not reaching a reader are of no value an advertiser and should not be counte in the circulation which he pays for. is perfectly obvious that if a news deal or a carrier boy takes more papers tha he sells, the left-overs should not b counted in the net paid circulation so to the advertiser.

Now, how should a publisher go the task of being frank with the adve tiser? Supposing his paper is sold on non-returnable basis. On the face of i we might assume that there could n possibly be left-overs to any extent be cause the dealer or newsboy would se to it, for the protection of his own profit that only enough papers were delivere to him exactly to fill his requirement But if a publisher insists on standing pa on this assumption, he may easily be le into accepting pay from the advertise for something which he is not in fac delivering. You all know what may hap pen. The wholesale rate of the pape may be low enough to permit the deale to take a chance. A bonus or salary ma be allowed, with the honest intention o compensating the dealer for extra effort Dealers sometimes carry papers as a accommodation side-line and would rathe have some left-overs regularly than dis appoint good customers by being out These and other practices, perfectly legitimate in themselves, may make i possible that the first assumption of one hundred per cent delivery of every copy to a reader is no longer tenable. What shall the publisher then do? Shall he insist that, inasmuch as he gets cash for every paper sent out, therefore, he will not go further in search for the facts? I think that a true desire to accept pay from the advertiser for only what he knows he can deliver will lead the publisher to take the opposite attitude, and say: "I know there is a possibility of left-overs and I will make every effort to find out before I make any claim to the advertiser."

Supposing on the other hand his paper is on a returnable basis. The publisher might then say: "Inasmuch as dealers and newsboys can return all unsold copies and my records show that many copies have been returned and deducted, therefore I can legitimately assume that the net figure is my salable circulation." But, again, this assumption may have to be modified. Pressure of enterprising sales campaigns, coupled with the desire on the part of the dealer to hold a valued agency, may lead him to forget to return copies. This is especially so if bonuses for certain increases are offered. The true desire to deliver to the advertiser only what he knows is real circulation will prompt the publisher to know what has really happened, instead of what may have happened.

In short, what I am trying to say is that the spirit is the thing. All plans may be good if the spirit is right. The

AGATE LINE THE NEW FOREIGN TRADE WEAPON

Increased Advertising by U. S. and Germany in South American Newspapers Reflected in Immediate Rise in Exports—Journalism Depends More on Its Own Revenue and Less on Subsidies

NEWSPAPER advertising has replaced the menace of navies and armies as the chief weapon of the world's industrial nations in the battle for foreign trade, according to James I. Miller, vice-president and South American manager of the United Press, who sails for Buenos Aires Saturday, June 25, after two months in the United States.

"And advertising is by far the most effective weapon," said Mr. Miller. "South American newspapers have proved it.

"Last year, in the face of depressed business conditions, exports from the United States to all of South America increased ten per cent. United States manufacturers were the heaviest foreign advertisers in South American newspapers.

"German products were second in the amount of newspaper space used. And German exports to South American countries increased four per cent.

"On the other hand, English exports to the Southern continent showed a loss of 17 per cent. English manufacturers were not advertising in Latin-American newspapers to any great extent. Now they have started.

"Since 1923 the amount of space used by North American concerns in South American newspapers has doubled, and it is showing a constant increase.

"When North American advertising is fully developed it should represent at least ten per cent of the total advertising revenue of South American newspapers, and comprise another strong bond of common interest between the two continents."

The newspapers themselves, said Mr. Miller, look to North America for nearly all of their supplies and machinery with the exception of paper. Germany and the Scandinavian countries are at present selling South America the bulk of her newsprint.

"One of the biggest forward steps for the newspaper business in South America," said Mr. Miller, "was the recent withdrawal of newspaper subsidies by the Brazilian government. Increased local and foreign advertising has largely replaced this loss of revenue, and the Brazilian newspapers are now building on solid business foundations.

"Newspaper development in South America is going through the same process of evolution it did in the United States. Not many years ago North American papers were just throwing off political shackles which for so long retarded their growth as business enterprises and public service institutions. Similarly in South America the tendency is strongly toward an entire elimination of subsidies, whether of a political or commercial nature, and this trend found one of its first expressions in opposition to news services operated by European governments.

"The forward-looking publishers of South America have, of course, torn many a leaf out of the books of North American newspaper men, particularly in the development of advertising, circulation, and in the mechanical departments. Some United States publishers could likewise profit by adopting methods and standards which have originated in Latin-America, but I have seen little evidence that they have done it.

"Some experiments with American methods have failed. One Buenos Aires newspaper put in a battery of telephone girls for its classified advertising department, but the Argentinians somewhat resented being solicited for ads on the telephone, and the experiment was discontinued.

"Circulation methods among the South American newspapers are much the same as here, but you will rarely find circulation figures being used as a basis for advertising solicitation. We have nothing in South America to correspond to the Audit Bureau of Circulations, nor is there an apparent need for it. The big advertisers, in buying space, seek to establish what American advertising men have learned to call 'consumer acceptance.' They place their advertising in the newspaper which itself has 'consumer acceptance' among its readers. The theory of Latin-American newspaper advertising executives is that circulation volume is no more potent as an argument than is volume of sales a first-grade reason for buying a product.

"The outstanding difference between journalism of North and South America," said Mr. Miller, "is the greater attention given there to international news.

"The leading newspapers south of the equator not only carry a large volume of international information, but they aim to classify it, and present it in consistent fashion to give their readers a true and continuing picture of international events, just as the North American newspapers give their readers such thorough service on baseball.

"The greater interest of South American readers in international affairs is largely due to the fact that the southern continent must look abroad for markets for its raw products, and for sources of supply for manufactured articles. Also in large part it is due to the general culture of the educated people of the Latin-American countries—a factor which is as yet but slightly understood in the United States.

"All United States news of international consequence now is reported regularly throughout South America, and interchange of news between the countries of South America has increased tremendously in the last few years. Previously the international gaze had been directed chiefly toward Europe.

"News problems of the South American editor are far more diverse than those of his northern contemporaries. The continual arrival of messages from all parts of the world imposes a burden of translation which is not experienced by North American editors. News is received at Buenos Aires in English, Spanish, Portuguese, French, Italian and German. It is distributed to newspapers published in Spanish, English, German, Italian, Jewish and Arabic. Fifteen translators are employed in the staff of the United Press Buenos Aires bureau. La Prensa has an additional corps of ten translators. One is assigned to the dispatches from each important country, and must thoroughly understand the affairs of the country with which he deals. A real translating feat was the handling of the Dawes reparations report in 1924. The text of 40,000 words was transmitted in full, received after noon of one day, translated, set and published in La Prensa the following morning. During the Tacna-Arica plebiscitary proceedings documentary texts of more than 15,000 words were received several times, translated and published the following morning."

Morning newspapers are still dominant in South America, said Mr. Miller, because of the long-established reading habits of the people. However, improvement of cable facilities and the consequent earlier availability of dispatches have enabled afternoon papers in recent years to grow continually in circulation and influence.

"South American editors generally regard their editorial columns with greater seriousness than do the North Americans," said Mr. Miller. "To be certain that an editorial expression is thoroughly consistent, it is not unusual for an editorial writer to make careful comparisons, before publishing it, with similar views expressed on his page over a period of many years. Editorial pages of leading foreign newspapers are thoroughly scanned, and an important part of reporting a big piece of international news is to quote the editorial comments of foreign papers.

"Not infrequently, in order to avoid any possible editorial inaccuracy, some South American newspapers will secure textually by cable the addresses of foreign statesmen, or similar documents, as a basis for formulating editorial comment. This is particularly true of La Prensa of Buenos Aires, and as a consequence of such meticulous care, its editorial views are read and frequently heeded by statesmen abroad as well as at home.

"Another distinguishing characteristic of South American journalism at its best is the high premium placed upon literary quality. They regularly seek contributions from the foremost international figures in art, literature, law, science and other fields. They print more of what you would call 'heavy features'—a field which in the United States is left largely to the magazines and technical publications. Distinguished scholars and statesmen of foreign countries are frequently engaged as contributing correspondents.

"South American editors can print features of this type because, unlike so many of their North American compatriots, they do not have to count the circulation they will gain every time they add a feature. They are striving for the best and most authoritative information available. They are trying to maintain a high standard of literary quality, rather than to get more readers. Of course, they would be interested and pleased to know that more people bought their paper because of something they were printing, but that wouldn't be the object of printing it.

"South American journalism is well started on an era of progress which will attract the attention of the entire world. In the last decade modern mechanical equipment has been everywhere introduced. Business standards among the leading newspapers are, in my opinion, higher than in most other countries of the world. Every newspaper of consequence now has abundant foreign news service at reasonable expense. New systems of cable, telegraphic and radio communication are everywhere being perfected.

"South American newspapers are establishing standards which North American editors may well study with care, and in many cases emulate."

"Last year in the face of depressed business conditions exports from the United States to all South America increased 10 per cent. U. S. manufacturers were the heaviest advertisers in South American newspapers."

"Since 1923 the amount of space used by North American concerns in South American newspapers has doubled and is showing a constant increase."

PORTLAND TELEGRAM IS SOLD FOR $226,000

Attorney Announces Purchase of Bankrupt Daily by Unnamed Group —Employes to Share Ownership

Sale of the Portland Telegram, evening newspaper which has been in bankruptcy, was announced by A. M. Cannon, referee in bankruptcy, June 18. The paper has been sold for $226,000 to David Lofgren, attorney acting as trustee for a group of purchasers whose identity has not been disclosed.

The Portland News has previously offered $200,000 for the Telegram, when sealed bids were received. This offer was subsequently withdrawn and the News later submitted a bid of $178,000. The Lofgren group about the same time put in its bid of $226,000, which was acceptable to Amedee M. Smith, trustee, and to representatives of the creditors.

L. R. Wheeler, one of the former owners of the Telegram with his brother, J. E. Wheeler, has given the present purchasers a lease on the Telegram Building.

In his formal statement after the purchase, which became immediately effective, Mr. Lofgren said:

"It is impossible for me to divulge the name of the clients for whom I purchased the assets of the Telegram Publishing Company.

"My clients consist of a group of men who have confidence in the future of Portland, a friendly interest in the Telegram, and its employes.

"As soon as the assets can be turned over, it is probable that some local trust company will be selected to represent the members of the group for whom I am acting, and the employes of the Telegram who are to become substantial stockholders."

N. H. DAILY SUSPENDS

The Concord (N. H.) Evening Telegram suspended publication Monday, after nearly two years of existence. Mechanical equipment and other assets of the paper were purchased by the Concord Monitor-Patriot. Edward J. Gallagher was publisher of the paper, which was owned by local business men. William E. Wallace was editor.

TRADE BODY ASSUMES AD CENSORSHIP POWERS

U. S. Commission Orders True Romances to Cease Publication of "Reducine" Copy and Firm to Stop Sale of Product—"Not A Precedent", Lawyer for Magazine Declares

THE precedent that the Federal Trade Commission has the power to order a publication to cease and desist printing of advertising which is false and misleading was set this week when that body ordered the Womanhood Publishing Corporation, New York, publisher of True Romances, to cease publication of copy from McGowan Laboratories, Inc., Chicago, concerning "Reducine," a cream claimed to have flesh reducing properties. True Romances is a Bernarr Macfadden publication.

The McGowan Laboratories also were ordered to stop the sale of "Reducine," in interstate commerce, and from advertising the cream in any publication.

The McGowan Laboratories, Inc., asserted in its advertising, according to the Commission's findings, that anyone may be freed from every ounce of unwelcome flesh, and that getting thin is made pleasurably simple and easy for anyone by simply applying "Reducine," which dissolves all excess fat by a harmless chemical reaction. The Commission found these statements to be false and the cream useless for the purpose claimed.

The Commission found also that the Womanhood Publishing Corporation, by publishing the fraudulent advertising of the McGowan Laboratories, in its magazine, True Romances, knowingly became a party to the scheme for defrauding the purchasing public.

The foregoing practices were also found to be unfair to competitors who truthfully advertise professional advice, instructions and other methods for reducing excess flesh.

The Commission's order follows:

IT IS NOW ORDERED by the Federal Trade Commission that respondents, McGowan Laboratories, Inc., and Womanhood Publishing Corporation, do cease and desist from all and singular the acts and practices in said complaint alleged and set forth in said findings as to the facts, to wit:

That respondent, McGowan Laboratories, Inc., cease and desist, in selling or offering for sale in interstate commerce its certain toilet compound or cream in said complaint referred to, and in causing its said compound to be advertised for sale in interstate commerce in newspapers, magazines, periodicals or other publications of general circulation throughout the United States and in various sections thereof, or in otherwise advertising the same for sale and misleading statements and assertions regarding the certain harmless chemical reaction which is alleged to take place in the portions of the human body to which said compound or cream is applied:

(1) To the effect that by the use of said product any one may be freed from every ounce of unwelcome flesh and that getting thin is made pleasurably simple and easy for any one.

(2) To the effect that, upon the application of said product to the human body, a harmless chemical reaction takes place, during which the excess fat is literally dissolved away, leaving the figure slim and properly rounded, giving the lithe grace to the body every man and woman desires.

(3) To the effect that any purchaser of said compound, by applying said product and patting it gently into the parts of the human body which the purchaser desires to slenderize, will thereby reduce any and every part of the body so treated no matter how much or how little excess flesh there may be, quickly, surely and permanently.

(4) To the effect that any portion or portions of the alleged effects of the application of said compound to the human body, will result therefrom.

That respondent, McGowan Laboratories, Inc., cease and desist in selling or offering for sale in interstate commerce its said certain toilet compound or cream, and in causing its said compound to be advertised for sale in interstate commerce, in newspapers, magazines, periodicals or other publications of general circulation throughout the United States and the various sections thereof, or in otherwise advertising the same for sale in interstate commerce, from making any false and misleading statement or statements or assertions as to the said product or as to the effect or effects of its use upon, or application to, the human body.

That respondent, Womanhood Publishing Corporation, cease and desist from incorporating in its certain magazine, to wit: True Romances, and distributing the same as a part of said magazine to its subscribers and to the purchasers thereof in and throughout the several States of the United States or any section thereof, all and singular the false and misleading statements and assertions in relation to the certain toilet compound or cream sold and offered for sale in interstate commerce by respondent, McGowan Laboratories, Inc., alleged and set forth in the complaint herein, or set forth in the Commission's findings as to the Facts herein, or referred to or set forth in Paragraph One or Paragraph Two of this Order.

That respondent, Womanhood Publishing Corporation, cease and desist from incorporating any of the false and misleading statements as to said toilet compound or cream referred to in Paragraph Three of this Order or any similar false and misleading statement or assertion, as to said toilet compound or cream, or as to the effect of its application to the human body, in any newspaper, magazine, periodical or other publication, and distributing same as a part of such newspaper, magazine, periodical or other publication to the subscribers therefor, or purchasers thereof, in and throughout the several states of the United States or in any section thereof.

The respondents are required to report to the Commission within 30 days the manner in which they have complied with the order.

By this ruling, as it pertains to True Romances, which is entirely new in Trade Commission history, the body assumes the power of censoring advertising and of ordering a publisher to bar it from his columns.

Both the McGowan Laboratories and True Romances consented to the issuance of the order.

Joseph Schultz, attorney for the Womanhood Publishing Corporation, in discussing the case for EDITOR & PUBLISHER, declared that he did not believe that a precedent had been established, or that power to order advertising barred from a publication is within the jurisdiction of the Trade Commission.

"We did not fight this action for the reason that the copy had already been barred from True Romances at the time the Federal body opened its case in July, 1926," he declared. "In addition the McGowan Laboratories signified their intention accepting the cease and desist action of the Commission.

"The last 'Reducine' copy ran in August, 1926, and for that reason any action the Trade Commission might take later was of purely academic interest to us.

"I disagree, however, that consent to the action constitutes a precedent, and question the Commission's jurisdiction in the case of publishers. Had the product been one we wanted to back up we would have made a test case of it.

"The Trade Commission stands in the position of attacking fraudulent advertising from the standpoint of unfair competition. I cannot conceive of fraudulent advertising being unfair competition—it is a criminal offense punishable under the Federal law of using the mails to defraud.

"As I view it, the Commission is organized to restrain unfair practices as they relate to methods of doing business, not as to quality of products offered for sale. If it can say to a firm 'Your article does not have the qualities you claim for it,' why cannot it go further and say 'Your price for this product is too high considering its value, you must reduce the price?'

"The Commission's order states that by printing the advertising of 'Reducine' the magazine knowingly becomes a party to the fraud. In a contested case I think the Commission would be hard put to prove knowledge on the part of a publisher.

"Despite all this, however, I do not think publishers generally should oppose such action by the Commission. There is entirely too much fraudulent advertising appearing. There ought to be some way of censoring misleading advertising for the protection of the public. A publisher owes it to his readers to protect them from fraudulent schemes just as a restaurant owner owes it to his patrons to see that the food he serves them is not poisonous. Without the aid of the publishers fraudulent advertising cannot exist.

"Many newspapers and magazines exercise rigid censorship, but there are many that do not. The advertising fraternity itself, I believe can clean up the situation.

"Every person in the publishing business should approve stringent censorship, but not by giving more power to a Federal body."

LOCAL DRUGGISTS CAN PROFIT BY USING MORE NEWSPAPER SPACE

ONE of the big fields for advertising which the average small town daily is not developing to the extent that it should is the local druggist, J. Earle Mavity, advertising manager of the Valparaiso (Ind.) Daily Vidette, told members of the Inland Daily Press Association at its recent May meeting in Chicago.

"Drug stores nowadays carry as varied a stock as many of the small department stores and the hours during which the drug store is kept open makes possible an extremely large volume of business," Mr. Mavity said. "Drug store proprietors are for the most part live wire merchandisers and are in one of the most highly competitive fields in the retail business. And it is the very keenness of this competition which makes advertising necessary. This I have demonstrated to my own satisfaction at least, in Valparaiso, a city of 8,000 population located 45 miles southeast of Chicago.

"Twice within the past year, James L. Meagher, one of our local druggists, has used a double page truck to announce a special merchandising event.

"In the early part of December, 1926, Mr. Meagher used a double page truck in connection with his announcement of the semi-annual Penslar Drug sale at his store. The sale ran four days during which he did a cash business of $2,159 and wrote onto his books in 30-day charge accounts more than $500. Besides this he put away some $400 worth of merchandise to be called and paid for before Christmas. The sale paved the way for one of the most successful holiday businesses that the store has ever done.

"Then in March of this year, Mr. Meagher again used a double page truck combining a paint and wall paper sale with the Penslar one-cent sale. This merchandising event covered a period of eight days (including two Saturdays). Cash register receipts for these eight days were more than $3,500 and the total posted to charge accounts was more than $2,000. And Mr. Meagher has done a tremendous business in paints and wall paper ever since.

"There are seven drug stores in the city, two of them larger than the Meagher store. Three of these seven stores will average more than 250 inches per month in each of the two daily papers here. All three of these have used full page ads frequently but Mr. Meagher has been the only one to attempt the double spread and so satisfactory has it been that he intends to keep up the practice."

McNITT BUYS JOHNSON SYNDICATE INTERESTS

Latter Retires as President and General Manager of Johnson Features and Editors' Feature Service

W. H. Johnson this week resigned as president and general manager of Johnson Features, Inc., New York, and Editors' Feature Service, Cleveland, and is at present on a leave of absence.

V. V. McNITT

Mr. Johnson's stock interest in the syndicates has been sold to V. V. McNitt, president of the McNaught Syndicate, who was subsequent to Mr. Johnson's resignation elected general manager of the two companies. He assumed his duties Monday. The Central Press Association, Cleveland, owned by Mr. McNitt, is continuing to issue its service in its own plant as usual.

Mr. McNitt plans to strengthen and improve the services as rapidly as possible, he stated.

Mrs. Mary H. Rumsey retains her interest in Johnson Features, Inc., and Editors' Feature Service, Mr. McNitt said.

George Barr Baker was elected president of both companies, succeeding Mr. Johnson.

RECORDS THAT CHECK DANGEROUS COST TRENDS

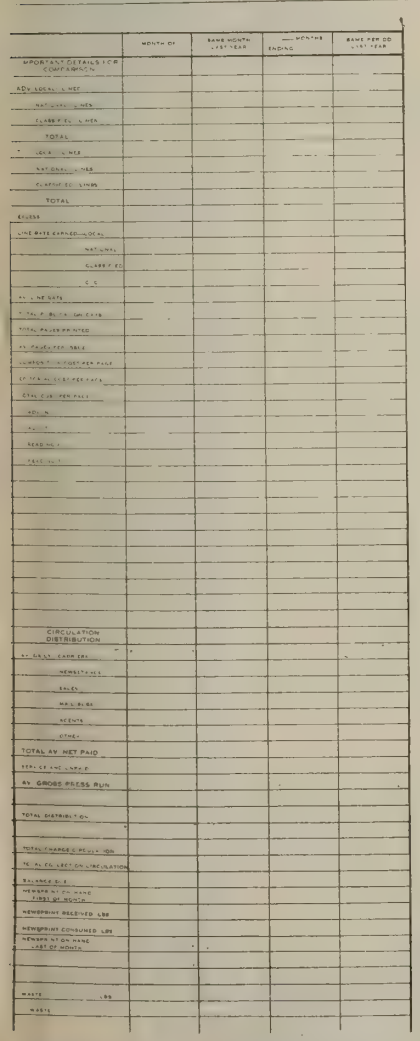
Publishers No Longer Find Bank Balance Sufficient Index to Business Health—Simple Systems Reveal All Important Facts Whenever Wanted

THERE are any number of legends in the newspaper business of famous proprietors and publishers who wanted to know nothing about the daily affairs of their property beyond the amount of the bank balance. If that was satisfactory, they could go fishing. If not, authority raised its voice and explanations followed. Such was the fabled simplicity of a by-gone day. It may have been fortunes for proprietors surrounded by capable and devoted souls in times when fortunes were written with fewer figures than is the rule today. It may have sufficed when a metropolitan daily could exist on the revenue produced by eight-page editions. But it is as remote as the Stone Age from newspaper publishing of 1927.

Publishers charged with the profitable guidance of modern newspaper machines watch them as a patient is watched upon the operating table. Daily reports are given them by responsible executives of the amount of the current issue's circulation, extraordinary activity by competitors, weather conditions or other details which might send the circulation or the volume of linage up or down for the day, the number of agate lines (segregated ad lib.) printed in their own paper and their local competitors, sometimes even the linage of semi-competitive newspapers in nearby cities. They know each evening or each morning, how much newsprint their pressrooms are using, how much goes into salable papers, how much is wasted, and how; they keep a stop-watch on the composing room and foundry, as well as the pressroom, and are prepared instantly to call to the carpet the wretch whose blunder caused seconds' or minutes' delay in the progress of an edition.

They get daily and weekly reports of income and expense from the responsible departments. And, of course, they get the daily bank balance that was paramount to their ancestors.

In recent years, much mental energy has been used to devise a form which will give for the calendar month a composite picture of the business, compared with the same month last year, and often giving a cumulative and comparative total of the year to date, in aggregate and by departments.



A simple form giving some of the data mentioned is used by the South Bend (Ind.) News-Times. It is reproduced below and is self-explanatory. Earnings from advertising, circulation, and miscellaneous sources are divided under their principal headings; expenses are given by departmental totals, the details of department expenses becoming available on a special form whenever desired by publisher or chief of department. One interesting feature is the corner data showing the percentage of increase or decrease for the month in earnings, expenses, gross earnings, and net income and giving a money comparison of weekly payrolls for the current and last year.

Another form, while not put forward as a model by its compiler, Walter C. Johnson, general manager of the Chattanooga News, is nevertheless the most complete example of its kind which has been laid upon this writer's desk. As reproduced upon the opposite page, it is legible, and needs no lengthy description. It expresses the present views of Mr. Johnson, who as president of the Southern Newspaper Publishers' Association and for many years its secretary, continuously urged upon his colleagues the necessity for accounting systems that would give them quickly a true picture of their business. Under his leadership and that of John A. Park, Raleigh Times, now the S. N. P. A. president, that organization has made excellent progress in bringing Southern newspapers to view modern accounting methods approvingly and they have supplemented their own work by obtaining the counsel of the Inland Daily Press Association, one of the first newspaper bodies to find an interesting and profitable field in newspaper book-keeping. The sheet reproduced below is a composite of many ideas gathered over a number of years, with improvements incorporated by Mr. Johnson early this year.

"The daily and weekly report forms of the Chattanooga News," Mr. Johnson tells EDITOR & PUBLISHER, "are so designed that we are able to keep thoroughly posted on every large detail of our business. It is not complicated and does not require a large clerical force. For example, we have a form reporting on advertising secured. This comes to my desk at the end of the week and it not only shows the total charge on local advertising, but enables me to keep a line on the work of the solicitor, with very little trouble. The figures are tabulated weekly, and in addition, we have a recapitulation sheet made up at the end of each six months which compares each month and quarter with the corresponding periods of previous year. By this method, we are able to determine whether a solicitor is showing an increase or a loss and most of all the number of charges for each period.

"We have recently improved our 'Comparative statement of revenue and expenses and details of publication,' which not only visualizes every phase of our business for the calendar month, but also carries a comparison for the corresponding month last year. We do not fool ourselves on expenditures, but practically close our books each month. The net income for the month is easily ascertained. We close every six months, although a number of newspapers and other business concerns close their books only

TO BUILD PACIFIC EMPIRE ON AD FOUNDATIO

Speakers at Portland Convention Urge Co-operation to Replace Policy of Competition Betwee States—Harold J. Stonier of Los Angeles New President

PORTLAND, Ore., June 23—Problems of the Pacific Coast, its industrial development and the furtherance of a friendly alliance among the states and cities of that region were the particular concern of the Pacific Coast Advertising Clubs Association, meeting in Portland June 19 to 23. Leading advertising men and executives in allied activities presented a keen analysis of the situation and the important role that advertising is playing and will continue to play in the upbuilding of the Pacific West.

HAROLD J. STONIER

The convention doubtless was the most important the Coast Clubs have ever held. There was a registration of 817 delegates on Monday when the convention started to get down to business, following an inspirational program on Sunday. The number continued to mount to more than 900 registrations. All sections were well represented. California sent two special trains, one from San Francisco and one from Los Angeles, while the Pacific Northwest Clubs participated 100 per cent. There was an especially active and prominent delegation from Hawaii, headed by Raymond C. Brown, secretary of the territory and president of the Honolulu Advertising Club. The Islanders came as prospective hosts for the next convention.

An aggressive alliance, rather than destructive competition among the cities of the Pacific Coast, was urged upon the convention by David Whitcomb, general chairman of the Pacific Coast Empire Association and former president of the Seattle Chamber of Commerce. The Empire Association was one of the big factors of the convention. In addition to Mr. Whitcomb's talk, Harry Chandler and C. G. Milham, as representing that organization, presented a statement pointing out the economic and commercial advantages of unified advertising.

The position of the railroads, appreciative of the efforts of advertising men to forward the interests of the Pacific Coast, was expressed by F. S. McGinnis, passenger traffic manager of the Southern Pacific, who spoke in the absence of Paul Shoup on the subject, "What Community Advertising Means to the Average Man."

Recognition of radio as an important element in advertising and one that must be taken into consideration was given by the Association and it was the first time that this subject has had a serious place in deliberations of the convention. It was brought before the meeting by George J. Povdeyn, Pacific Coast manager of the National Broadcasting Company, in a talk on "The Fourth Dimension in Advertising."

His theme was the radio, its achievements in an advertising field, and its possibilities. More than 6,000,000 homes of America now are equipped with radio service, he said, and there is a field of 22,000,000 more to be reached.

Frank T. Carroll, advertising director of the Indianapolis News and president of the Association of Newspaper Advertising Executives, spoke on "Marketing the Great Commodities of the Pacific Through Advertising," urging the continuance of development of the tourist trade, but giving greater attention to the creation of a more extensive demand for coast products of all kinds.

A vigorous protest against the idea of grouping women together as vain, foolish and extravagant buyers was sounded by Bertha K. Landis, Mayor of Seattle, in her address on "What The Housewife Demands in Advertising." The advertiser who proceeds on that basis will reap a disappointing return, she averred, because he insults woman's intelligence.

"As a matter of fact," said she, "Women buy more efficiently, carefully and economically than men. This is due to long practice and training."

"The most casual review of the advertising columns of any daily newspaper will reveal that the leading and most aggressive manufacturers of merchandise today are likewise the leading newspaper advertisers," L. M. Barton, advertising manager of the Chicago Daily News, told the delegates. "To them newspaper advertising is a genuine factor in the distribution of their product, so great a factor that the average retailer will buy and put his greatest sales effort behind newspaper-advertised merchandise.

"In fact, newspaper advertising today is second only to the necessity of making a good product at a fair cost and a reasonable selling price."

The section of the convention devoted to church advertising had particularly interesting sessions. Walter W. Cribbins, San Francisco advertising man, gathered together a large audience of Portland preachers and told them what they needed to make their churches succeed.

"Give me the right kind of preacher, and let me tell the world about him with simply worded but enthusiastic advertisements, and I will guarantee to pack your greatest auditoriums every time it is announced that he is to speak," said Mr. Cribbins. "Advertising if used properly will double the congregation of the biggest church within a period of 12 months."

The keynote speech of the convetion was made on Sunday afternoon by Harold J. Stonier, vice-president of the university of Southern California and president of the Los Angeles Advertising Club.

His topic was, "Building the Era of the Pacific Through Advertising," and the address was delivered in place of one scheduled by Senator Borah and which his physicians advised him not to make.

From the time Mr. Stonier sounded the keynote until the end of the convention on Thursday there was not an idle minute. The evenings were given over chiefly to entertainment, including dances and dinners and a stunt night at the Heilig Theaters. On Thursday a trout breakfast was served on Eagle Creek, 40 miles from Portland, and the delegates were taken on a ride around the Mount Hood loop Highway.

Harold J. Stonier was the unanimous choice for president in the nominating committee, consisting of ex-presidents and secretaries of the Association.

Anne P. Keil, executive secretary of the Portland Advertising Club and convention secretary, was the committee's choice for vice-president at large, and the first woman in the history of the Association to be thus honored.

Richard P. Milne, former president of the Advertising Club of Seattle, will be proposed for vice-president, representing Western Washington; Raymond P. Kelley of Spokane will be proposed for re-election to vice-president for Eastern Washington. William P. Merry, retiring president of the Portland Advertising Club, will be proposed for vice-president for Oregon; George Montell of Palo Alto, Cal., vice-president for Northern California and Hawaii, and Tom H. Shore of San Diego, for re-election for vice-president for Southern California. Honolulu was the choice of the committee for the next convention.

The Association has 29 clubs, located in Oregon, Washington, Idaho, California and Hawaii. It has a membership of 4,800.

Four new clubs were admitted to membership, Eugene and Albany in Oregon and Pullman and Wenatchee in Washington.

ARTHUR BRISBANE CHARGED WITH BAD FAITH IN SALE OF JERSEY DAILY

Four Defendants in $88,500 Suit Say He Misrepresented Condition of Elizabeth Times in Their Answer to Action Brought by Courtland Smith

ARTHUR BRISBANE, editor of the New York Journal, must submit to an examination before trial by attorneys for the defense in a suit for $88,500 based on the transfer of the Elizabeth (N. J.) Times from Mr. Brisbane to Joseph P. Bannon, Harry A. Braelow, Herbert Krancer and Moses L. Annenberg, it was decided in Westchester County Supreme Court last week when Judge Frank L. Young denied a motion of Max D. Steuer, in behalf of Mr. Brisbane, to vacate the notice of examination.

The suit in which Mr. Brisbane is being asked to testify before trial is being brought by Courtland Smith, brother-in-law of Mr. Brisbane, to collect the sum of $88,500 due in payment for 75 per cent of the stock of the Elizabeth Times, which was owned by Mr. Brisbane at the time of its sale to the four defendants.

The suit is being brought by Mr. Smith because prior to the start of the action, Mr. Brisbane transferred to him all of his title in the property.

In an amended answer to the suit filed in the Westchester court last week, the four defendants made charges of fraud and misrepresentation against Mr. Brisbane.

In the filed documents covering the case it is stated that Mr. Brisbane, through Raymond F. McCauley, purchased the Elizabeth Times in October, 1925, for $62,000, and that Mr. Brisbane later advanced the paper $26,500, making a total of $88,500. On Dec. 3, 1925, Mr. Brisbane by written agreement turned over to the four defendants, M. L. Annenberg, Harry A. Braelow, Joseph P. Bannon and Herbert Krancer, a 75 per cent share in the paper for $88,500. They were to give bonds in this sum, which would constitute a first lien on the property. Mr. Brisbane was to sell the remaining 25 per cent of the stock to an individual to be named by himself.

The four defendants were bound by the agreement to take over the management of the paper, pay expenses and meet all losses, and were not to declare any dividends until the bonds covering the purchase price were paid off.

On May 26, 1926, the defendants wrote Mr. Brisbane that the paper had been running at a considerable loss since the purchase, and inasmuch as the 75 per cent of the stock of the corporation had never been delivered to them they were ready to return the property to Mr. Brisbane at any time prior to June 1. Unless he assumed control prior to June 1, 1926, they would on that date close down the paper and dispose of its assets, the letter said.

The defendants withdrew from the paper on June 1, and on June 29 the paper was adjudged insolvent in a creditors suit. It was sold in July, 1926, at public auction.

Mr. Smith, plaintiff, asked judgment in the sum of $88,500 on the basis that the defendants had failed to carry out their written agreement, and had refused to give Mr. Brisbane bonds constituting a first lien on the property.

In the amended answer to the action filed last week the defendants make the following charges:

That the agreement of sale was obtained by the plaintiff's assignor, Arthur Brisbane, by fraud and deception in that he had led them to believe the paper was losing but $900 a week when the sum was in reality from $1,500 to $1,700.

It also stated that he had promised to give them the benefit of his influence in the operation of the paper, and had promised to go to the big store advertisers in New York and procure from them one full page advertisement for publication in the Elizabeth Times every Sunday.

Mr. Brisbane also promised to call on advertisers in Elizabeth and stimulate their advertising patronage, and to use his influence with Governor Moore of New Jersey and Mayor Hague of Jersey City, the defendants stated.

In addition, the answer set forth, he promised to sell a special edition of the New York Journal to the defendants at a price of $1 a hundred for daily distribution with the Elizabeth Times, and a special edition of the New York Sunday American at a price of five or six cents each for distribution with the Sunday Times at the single price of ten cents. On both these propositions he said he had obtained the consent of William Randolph Hearst, the defendants alleged.

All these promises the defendants believed to be true, they stated, and they were thereby induced to purchase the paper.

None of these promises were performed, nor was the 75 per cent stock interest turned over to them, their answer to the suit states, and therefore the purchase agrement was void from its inception. Dismissal of the complaint is asked.

DeWitt & Van Aken are the attorneys for the defendants, while Max D. Steuer is representing the plaintiff.

Joseph P. Bannon is circulation director of the New York Journal and Moses L. Annenberg was circulation director of the Hearst newspapers until his retirement a year ago. Mr. Krancer is in the contracting business and Harry Braelow is connected with the Newark News Dealers' Supply Company. Mr. Krancer acted as manager of the Times during the months it was operated by this group.

HEARST AD DEPARTMENTS COMPETING FOR TROPHY

The display trophy

EARLY in 1927 the display advertising staff of the Seattle Post-Intelligencer devised a plan of competition for monthly percentage of increased local linage for the morning papers in the Hearst service. This plan was submitted and approved by the Boston Advertiser, Chicago Herald and Examiner, Baltimore American and Milwaukee Sentinel. Because of a change in classifications from local to national the San Francisco Examiner and the Los Angeles Examiner did not enter the test.

The inter-paper contest commenced with the figures of March, 1927, and is to complete itself in February, 1928. At the end of each month the trophy is awarded and remains in possesion of the paper winning it until the month following.

The trophy is to become the property of the publication winning it the greatest number of months within the year. As can be seen from the inscriptions, it was won in March by the Baltimore American, in April by the Chicago Herald Examiner, and in May by the Seattle Post-Intelligencer.

A recent article about Akron in a Cleveland newspaper contained the following:

Akron is properly feeling good over the recent revelation that the city now stands second in manufacturing in the state (Ohio), having passed Cincinnati in the period between the last two censuses of manufacturing, 1923 and 1925. Nor is the relationship changed any by including in the Cincinnati total the production of Norwood, Ohio, its large manufacturing suburb. Cincinnati and Norwood together had a production of $514,755,000 in 1925, compared with Akron's $565,391,000.

But if Norwood can be added to Cincinnati's total, then Barberton, Cuyahoga Falls, and Kenmore should be included with Akron and these would bring the year's work of the Akron industrial district for 1925 to $612,195,000.

Indeed if Akron and Cleveland continued to expand their industrial output at the rate maintained between 1923 and 1925, Akron would pass Cleveland late in 1931 or early in 1932.

DETROIT goes ultra-violet regularly. That is, Detroiters travel consistently by responding regularly to advertisements that portray the sunshine lure, that display the bait of mountains, seas, lakes, flowers, blue skies and things to see.

Those who have travel-merchandise to sell, wherever it may be, can most profitably merchandise it through The Detroit Free Press, for this newspaper regularly carries more general resort and travel advertising than both other Detroit newspapers combined.

As the particular community that put the whole world a-wheel and behind the wheel, probably no other single area anywhere is more appreciative of

ADVERTISING'S EYE APPEAL NOW AIDED BY RADIO PATH TO EAR, SAYS ARNOLD

Second District of I. A. A. Hears Broadcasting Co. Official Call His Art the Fourth Dimension of Advertising—Thomson Brings A. B. C. Message

(By Telegraph to Editor & Publisher)

SCHENECTADY, N. Y., June 22.—Commercial broadcasting is the "fourth dimension of advertising," Frank A. Arnold, newly appointed director of development for the National Broadcasting Company, declared in one of the principal talks delivered at the convention of the Second District International Advertising Association here.

This new giant in business must be met on common ground with three other great publishing media—the newspapers, magazines and signboards, Mr. Arnold told the more than 500 delegates at the convention. Explaining the speaker continued:

"The immensity of the radio audience to whom programs are broadcast will be seen when we consider that 6,000,000 homes in the United States now have well equipped receiving sets with an average of better than five listeners to each set, while 21,000,000 homes are yet to be equipped before the saturation point is reached.

"Up to the present time, commercial copy has depended largely for its effectiveness on eye appeal, resulting in the most beautiful and attractive advertising the world has ever seen. Now, along comes this fourth dimension of advertising—"broadcasting" with its exclusive ear appeal, and by skilfully combining the two and by making its commercial program tie in closely with the printed page, broadcast advertising has succeeded, theoretically at least, in obtaining 100 per cent of individual interest in a given subject.

"The problems which surround the development of commercial broadcasting are very similar to those that face the publisher of a national periodical. To all intents and purposes, broadcasting is equivalent to a magazine of the air.

"The best broadcasting stations are today safeguarding the listener from objectionable forms of blatant advertising. All along, the great objective has been good will—the desire to establish a favorable relationship with an unknown and unseen clientele."

An appeal to buyers of circulation to make a more careful study of A. B. C. reports, particularly the inside pages of those reports which disclose how the circulation is obtained, was made by P. L. Thomson, president of the Audit Bureau of Circulations.

"Remember that when you make an advertising contract with a publisher you are not buying white space," he said. "White space is not what you want. It is the attention of a particular audience that you are after, and the more you know about that audience the more likely you are to make your message ring the bell."

Telling how the A. B. C. has worked out a spirit of co-operation for safeguarding common interests of advertiser and publisher, Mr. Thomson declared that a movement for self-government of the advertising business such as now prevails in the movie industry will find no trace of scandals as between national advertisers and publishers because of misrepresentation.

In his foreword Mr. Thomson cautioned the convention: "I hope that no time at this convention is going to be wasted in glorifying advertising as an end in itself and whooping up about it so that there may be a lot more of it. I hope we are all agreed that our objective is not more advertising volume but greater advertising efficiency."

"Good taste and common sense in advertising" was discussed by Miss Helen M. Rockey, president of the New York League of Advertising Women. She listed the qualifications of an advertising judge as: training, including schools, books and analysis of copy in magazines and newspapers; and tact, not "glorified lying," but desire to please.

Under the heading of tact, Miss Rockey placed the woman advertiser as highest. "Without being a feminist," she said, "I can safely claim that women have their place in advertising and as judges of advertising. Their very training in the desire to please makes them keen observers, quick to catch reactions, to note coming changes, to be good weather prophets."

Miss Rockey concluded with an appeal for exercise of censorship within the advertiser's own office as a safeguard for common sense and good taste.

Besides delegates from advertising clubs in New York, Pennsylvania, New Jersey, Delaware and Maryland, hundreds of persons interested in advertising attended the sessions which were held at the Edison Club Hall. Visiting women were entertained with an informal tea at the historic Schuyler Mansion in Albany. Nearly every delegate attended a big outdoor program at Luther's White Sulphur Springs Hotel at Saratoga Lake.

Rowe Stewart of the Philadelphia Record was toastmaster at the convention dinner, with Francis H. Sisson, vice-president of the Guaranty Trust Company, as principal speaker.

BRITISH PAPERS REPORT $5,600,000 PROFIT

Allied Newspapers, Ltd., of London and Manchester Showed Bigger Net in 1926 Than 1925 Despite Strike

By ALLAN DELAFONS

London Correspondent of Editor & Publisher

LONDON, June 10.—Profit amounting to £1,121,908. 19s. 3d. is announced by Allied Newspapers, Ltd., London and Manchester, at the annual meeting in London on June 9. Cecil Harmsworth, chairman of directors of the Daily Mail, the London Evening News, and the Weekly Dispatch, presided, and in his speech proposing the adoption of the report and accounts, pointed out that the profit was an increase on that of the previous year, which was £953,655. 8s. 1d., despite the general strike and the general dislocation of trade caused by the prolonged coal dispute.

After meeting all dividends £292,511. 8s. 6d. was carried forward to next year's account. The new building (Northcliffe House), was rendered necessary by the development of the papers owned by the company, and its cost had already been paid in the greater part from the cash resources of the company.

The innovation of a 20-page issue regularly by the Daily Mail was becoming increasingly popular and it had been necessary on occasion to print 24 pages. The Evening News advertisement scale had been increased, so great had been the demand for advertising space. The Weekly Dispatch, now 126 years old, was increasing in circulation. The following were elected as directors: Cecil Harmsworth, the Hon. Esmond Harmsworth, M. P., A. St. John Harmsworth, V. G. Harmsworth, Lieut.-Col. W. H. Wild, D. S. O., Walter G. Fish, C. B.E., P. A. Goudie, G. Ward Price, H. W. Wilson, F. L. Fitzhugh and James Heddle.

PHENOMENAL SALES OF WHIPPET CARS CREDITED TO NEWSPAPER ADVERTISING

President Willys Describes Dramatic Zone Presentation of New Model—40,000 Sold in 51 Days—$6,000,000 Net Profit First Half of 1927

By HAMMOND EDWARD FRANKLIN

A NET profit of about $6,000,000 before taxes for the first half of 1927 has been made possible by the success of the Whippet car, which is just observing its first birthday as a member of the Willys-Overland Company family of automobiles.

The Whippet, which has been termed "the sensation of a sensational industry," was introduced a year ago by unusual highly localized methods, which included extensive large-space newspaper advertising. Although brought out late in the buying season, the company sold 40,000 cars in 51 days. Sales for the year on this model, now well over 100,000, are expected to total about 115,000 when all returns are in. The company looks forward to entering the second half of the year with $15,000,000 in cash in its treasury, the largest in its history. During May alone it shipped 26,946 of its various cars with a value of around $23,000,000.

How the company put across the Whippet was described for EDITOR & PUBLISHER by John N. W. Willys, president of the company, shortly before sailing for the International Chamber of Commerce meeting at Stockholm.

When the corporation reached the decision to place upon the market a new model to replace the Overland 91, the first problem was to clear the dealer's show-rooms of the old model. This was accomplished in about four months. Through a dramatic presentation, the salesmen were interested in the new car, then zone by zone the dealers lined up, hard-hitting page space released at the psychological time in local newspapers and buying action by the public started.

The company had spent two years in perfecting the Whippet. The designers turned to Europe for the basic ideas behind the car, such as compact motor size and compact exterior dimensions, while it relied upon American methods of design as to roominess, riding comfort, standard tread and such features. The company recognized the trend toward smaller cars.

"The announcement of the Whippet line was made late in June of last year," Mr. Willys explained. "Cars were in production early that month but the plans of the sales department were so developed that none of these cars were sold in the separate sales zones throughout the country until each dealer in each zone could be supplied with a demonstrating model.

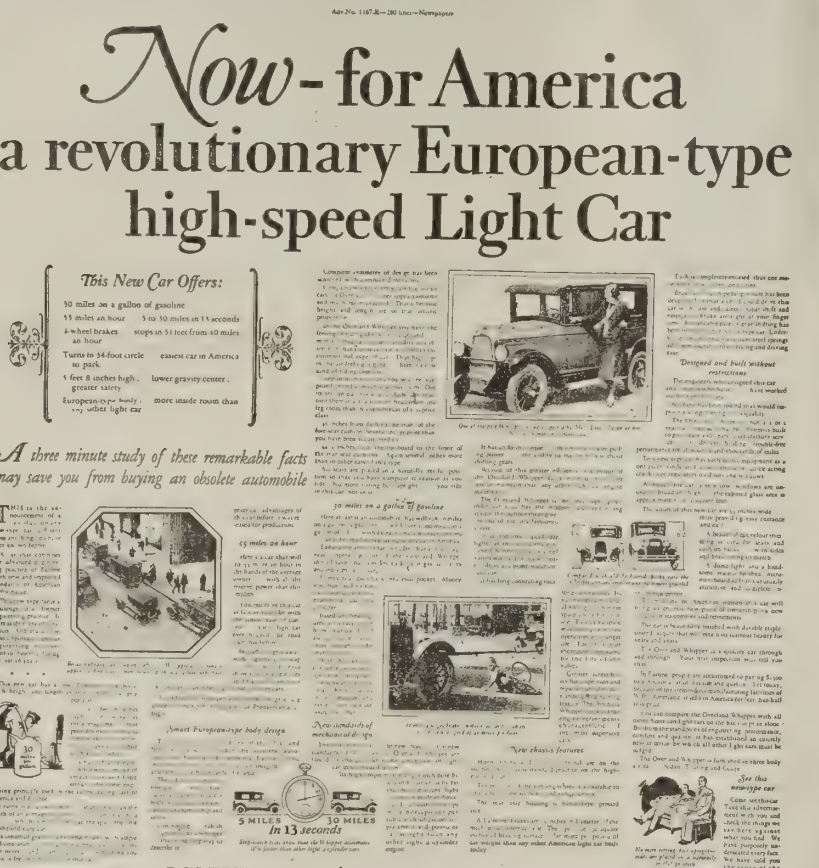
"There were five such zones: the East, the North Central West, the South, the South Central West and the Pacific Coast. The East zone was covered the first week, succeeding zones being covered in the order named, and complete national coverage was obtained in four weeks.

"Prior to the announcement of the Whippet in any zone, there was a series of meetings to cover that zone. Dealers and newspaper men were called in to hear the discussion of the plans for the announcement of the model. To facilitate matters, in some cases meetings for the press alone on certain points were held.

"The purpose of the original selling campaign was to keep the facts about Whippet as 'blind' as we could until it could be shown. It was essential to marshal the introductory advertising so the story could be released simultaneously with the arrival of the Whippet at each dealer's place of business. Newspapers offered the solution.

"At meetings such as I mention, newspaper men were shown the car, given the detailed story of its development, and then shown the advertising copy and details of the campaign, but were asked to keep all information secret until the date set for announcement.

"In many sections closely located to zones where announcements were being made (but where the zone announcement for the particular section was to be delayed), a definite obligation was placed upon the newspaper. I am glad to be able to say that every paper in the country closely adhered to the request that information about the Whippet be kept quiet until the release date.



"The announcement copy took the form of newspaper pages in the larger trade centers and copy somewhat smaller in the second and third divisions of the trade population.

"Much interest in light cars had been awakened by previous news notices appearing in the press about Citroen and other European cars whose representatives were in this country at the time in anticipation of a change in the general construction of American-built light cars. Their presence in the country had become a matter of news interest.

"Then came our big advertising campaign and the public was put in a receptive attitude toward the Whippet. As a result, I estimate that over 14,000,000 people streamed through our dealer establishments. Certainly, the name was on the tongues of millions of newspaper readers and the car won immediate recognition. The volume for the year speaks for itself."

The copy used showed the ease of use of the car in parking, gasoline economy, European-idea construction and many points in detail in feature news story style. Close watch was kept to capitalize every evidence of local interest.

The company's profits for the second quarter this year were $4,000,000 after all charges except Federal taxes. This showing would have been impossible without the Whippet, which now ranks high as an unusual current merchandising achievement, which owes much to newspaper advertising.

NATIONAL ADVERTISERS WANT MORE SMALL TOWN MARKET INFORMATION

Lack of Data Has Kept General Advertising from Weeklies, Cushing Tells N. E. A. Members—Outlines Material Needed—Quotes Henry Ford Letter

Following, in part, is the text of an address delivered before the National Editorial Association convention in Omaha last week by George W. Cushing, manager of the Detroit office of the American Press Association.

THE national advertiser is taking a greater interest than ever before in the small town market and the small town newspaper. Now, more than at any previous time, there seems to be a sincere effort on the part of sales and advertising managers and agency space buyers, to know as much as possible about advertising possibilities in the small towns that represent the backbone of this nation.

It is a situation that all of us should welcome. It is an opportunity to make the most of. And how shall we do it? What is it these men who have the control of national advertising expenditures want to know?

They want to know all they can about the small town market. Many of them are now asking themselves, "Have we been overlooking something?", and you and I know what they have been overlooking. We know that no publication is read so closely as the home town paper.

Eight out of ten of the men who sit behind advertising desks came from small towns—they know your strength—but they haven't given the proper consideration to using your advertising columns because they have been educated to the value of mass circulation.

Let us consider then what our competition does to impress its story on prospective advertisers. Every type of publication, with the exception of the small newspaper, has for some time offered various kinds of elaborate evidence to show how well it covered the market. The advertising manager has been offered all kinds of charts, maps, statistics on purchasing power, number of farms, wealth, literacy—all the factors to prove the buying power of a community, have been offered by these competing publications that come into the very homes we reach—and all with one thought in mind—that this or that large publication covered the advertiser's market.

And is it any wonder that the advertiser has considered these large units of circulation as sufficient, as doing the job for him? Why should he think of adding a thousand or more small newspapers when one publication, one plate, one invoice, would do the trick?

"Think of the bother of dealing with the little fellows," the big fellows tell him. I am glad to say the difficulties of placing advertising with a large list of small newspapers is not the problem that it once was. And the advertiser who really wants to reach this market isn't worrying so much about the bother. Modern advertising machinery is helping him take care of these details. He can reach this great audience easily and effectively. He will select your papers if he has all the facts.

The organization I represent has just completed a comprehensive radio survey. Other investigations have been made, still more are to be made, and right now we are working on a standard information form for country newspapers. There are certain things that the advertising or sales manager of a manufacturer of a national commodity wants to know about his market.

He wants to know the number of families it is possible to reach; the purchasing power of those families; and particularly in a small newspaper, the percentage of town and rural circulation. He wants to know something about the editorial contents of that paper, the buying habits, and ability of the people who read it to purchase the article he has to sell.

He wants to know the type of advertising you have been carrying, and the volume over a period of years. Many publications, and this pertains to all classes, are inclined to call attention to a single or six months' growth in advertising and circulation, especially when there has been an unusually large growth. The advertiser, however, wants to study the record of growth over a period of years. It's the average that counts.

He wants to know something, too, about your circulation. There is too prevalent a belief today among space buyers that the printed circulation of country newspapers is not always the true circulation. That belief is due probably to the fact that there is no standard unit of measurement for country newspapers. We have no Audit Bureau of Circulations. I hope the day is not far distant when we may have a standard form of auditing circulations.

Quite as important as circulation is the question of rates. The National Editorial Association has done much to stabilize rates—to suggest a uniform rate. But that isn't always possible. Conditions are different—costs vary. The advertiser recognizes this. He does want to be sure, however, that the rate is a fair rate—that it is worth all that he pays for it, and that he isn't paying any more than someone else for the same circulation.

These things the agency space buyer deals with daily in his consideration of other types of publications. He can study them more easily, because there aren't so many. He thinks of 10,000 weekly newspapers as a hopeless task. He is apt to give up and follow the easiest way—use a few large units of circulation, and trust in Providence that he will get coverage.

The job then is to give these advertisers facts about the small town newspaper market, to give them information that will help them make up their minds to use your papers, and to always emphasize that it is just as easy to do business with small country newspapers as with large publications.

It should not be difficult nor costly to furnish the facts. Your field secretaries have already accomplished a great deal by gathering information from their publishers, and acting as a clearing house.

The field secretary's post is an important one. For many publishers, the field secretary is the only outside point of contact. Next fall your field secretaries will meet in Detroit. There they will have the opportunity to meet all the national advertisers in that city. It is such contacts as this that will bring business to you. It would be a fine thing if every publisher could talk to the advertising managers or the advertising agencies that send him business. That, of course, is a difficult thing to do, but you can get the information for these men. You can tell them all that they want to know about your market. You can make it easy for them to put country newspapers on their advertising lists.

This is my second invitation to talk to the members of the National Editorial Association. Last year at the last minute, I had to cancel my plans to be with you at Los Angeles, because the Ford Motor Company had just reached a decision to hold up its advertising program. I stayed in Detroit pending developments. A year has passed, and I am pleased report there are developments on t account. I know that every publisher the United States is interested in the a vertising plans of the Ford Motor Co pany. I asked for some message to bri to you publishers here at Omaha, a while no public announcement has be made by the Ford Motor Company, have a personal message for you, writt by Mr. Henry Ford himself. I take gre pleasure in reading it.

"To the Members of the National Editorial Association in Convention at Omaha.

"Gentlemen: I am glad of the oppo tunity to send a greeting to the pu lishers of our home community new papers. Besides being the oldest and mo distinctively American type of public tion, the small town and country pre is our only real newspaper. It comes t us as a friendly visitor from the neigh borhood that we knew and still kno best. It has avoided the errors of moder journalism without any sacrifice of it fluence. The Ford Motor Company ha always found the country press an efficien means of reaching the public and w foresee further use of its facilities in th future.

"With best wishes for a profitable con vention, I am

"Respectfully, HENRY FORD."

CHARLESTON (W. VA.) DAILY MAIL OCCUPIES NEW $300,000 PUBLISHING PLANT

New Charleston Mail Plant

THE Charleston (W. Va.) Daily Mail recently occupied its new $300,000 three-story home at the corner of Virginia and McFarland streets directly opposite its old location and published an 80-page edition celebrating the event.

Ground was broken for the new structure in June, 1926. The building has a frontage of 50 feet on Virginia street and a depth of 149 feet on McFarland. Total floor space is 20,000 square feet, as compared with the 8,500 square feet in the old quarters just vacated.

The new Daily Mail building is of Indiana limestone, in a classic design with a pilastered Corinthian order super-imposed on a rusticated base.

The main entrance door on Virginia street is set in a wide, moulded frame, the lintel of which is ornamented in true printer's fashion, a character stamp for the building.

Carved in bas-relief on a group of Roman shields stand replicas of the old Washington press, a printer's stick, and a matrix from a linotype machine.

On the first floor are found the business, circulation, and advertising departments. A steel, mahogany-stained counter, runs almost the full width of the room.

On this same floor, back of the departments named, is found the press room and mailing room. In the pressroom has been installed a Scott sextuple, unit-type press, and room has been provided for extension to much larger size. The press is electrically controlled and operated by the Cutler-Hammer system. It is equipped for printing a 24-page tabloid section and 24-page regular newspaper at the same operation.

The press is equipped with an automatic paper-break stop. Newspapers are folded, counted, and delivered by conveyors to the mailing room. Papers can be delivered to the conveyor from the press on both sides.

Nearby is found the paper storage room, which will hold four to five carloads of newspaper rolls. An ink tank is also found in this room, which has a capacity of 5,000 pounds of ink. The ink is carried to the press by gravity. Ample trucking space and every facility necessary for speedy delivery is found adjacent to the mailing room.

On the second floor of the new building are the editorial rooms and owner's offices, and a community center. The floors of the first and second-story are covered with dark gray battleship linoleum.

The state headquarters of the Associated Press are also on this floor. The suite of executive offices are furnished throughout in American walnut. A handsomely furnished library, file room, each with distinctive features of its own, are found on this floor.

On the third floor is found the composing room, where 12 Linotypes, a Monotype material making machine and Ludlow typograph and other modern devices are installed.

The stereotype foundry is on this floor. The composing room and foundry are lighted by large windows on four sides, and artificial light is seldom used.

This building is in the form of an "L," one part being three stories and the other one story in height.

The Daily Mail is published by Walter E. Clark, who was Governor of Alaska during President Taft's administration. He was formerly a Washington correspondent, for many years in the bureau of the New York Sun. He purchased th old Daily Mail property at a sheriff's sa in 1914.

Mr. Clark was assisted in the desig of the building by S. P. Weston of Ne York.

RADIO ADVERTISING UP 15 PERCENT OVER 1926

First 3 Months of 1927 Saw Big In crease, President of Manufacturers Group Reports—Weeding Superlatives from Copy

Radio advertising volume in newspapers of the United States during the first three months of 1927 increased 15 per cent over the total for the same quarter in 1926 and the use of superlatives is rapidly vanishing with a changing trend toward statements of fact as basis of advertising copy declared Major Herbert H. Frost, first president of the Radio Manufacturers Association, in an address at the third annual convention in Chicago last week.

The test of good advertising lies in interpretation of statements by the consumer, he told several thousand manufacturers, jobbers and dealers at the gathering representing more than $200,000,000 capital.

The period of spectacular merchandising by the manufacturer has passed and the manufacturer of the future must strive for a program in proper proportion to a fair return on invested capital, Major Frost declared.

We'd better save a few marines for Chicago.—Honolulu Star-Bulletin.

The San Francisco Chronicle

during the first 5 months of 1927 gained in national advertising (excluding automotive) 42,868 lines—the largest gain of any San Francisco newspaper.

The Chronicle for the same period also led all other San Francisco newspapers in the following classes of quality advertising:

	CHRONICLE Lines	Second Newspaper Lines

The Chronicle's net paid circulation for the six months ended March 31st, 1927 was a gain of 7,350 Daily and 11,558 Sunday over the corresponding period a year ago.

SIX . . . SCIENTIFIC . . . REASONS WHY THE EXPERTS ENDORSE INTERTYPE IDEAL NEWS FACE FOR LEGIBILITY

[1] Thicker hairlines and serifs. Less chance of broken letters in stereotyping. Greater legibility. But note that sufficient contrast has been retained to avoid monotone. Monotone letters are displeasing to the eye.

[2] Normal spacing between letters affects legibility just as spacing between lines. Makes it possible to produce matrices with strong side walls—more durable, less likely to break in the lock up and in distribution.

[3] Adequate lengths and heights of ascending and descending letters. Intertype has retained the familiar proportions, to which the eye is accustomed. Familiar word-pictures, easier reading.

[4] Lower case has been enlarged, in proportion to capitals, enough to open up certain letters for better stereotyping and greater legibility. But this has not been overdone. The eye can scarcely detect the difference in individual letters or words, but the improvement in legibility is apparent.

MIDWEST STORES USING NEWSPAPERS TO COMBAT "RADIO MAIL ORDERS"

Refuting Broadcast "Bargains" with Price Quotations from Their Own Stocks—Several Stations Making Direct Price Announcements

SMALL town merchants in middle western states, particularly Iowa, Missouri, Kansas and Nebraska, are using newspaper advertising to combat the new "radio mail order" business which has been making inroads upon their trade.

Several broadcasting stations in the middle west operated by private businesses have been broadcasting direct advertising, announcing "bargain" rates on dress goods, prunes, seeds, smoked salt, overalls, and many other staple articles carried in the average store. In some cities merchants have been quick to accept the radio challenge and have placed copy showing that the "bargain" prices announced over the radio are in reality higher than their own prices for the same articles.

The St. Joseph (Mo.) Commercial News, retailers' paper, in a recent article discussed the situation as follows:

"'This is Station BLAH, the chummy farmers' station. Now, before we have our old-time fiddlers give us some good old-fashioned tunes, I am going to tell you about those dress patterns we are selling.'

"And so on, far into the night.

"Who in the Middle West spends part of his evenings in front of a loud speaker in the hope of getting some of the wonderful entertainment on the air these nights has not been intrigued into listening to some of the sales appeals which are being sent out in behalf of the greatest bargains ever offered in prunes, tires, radio tubes, seeds, hams, candy, pig meal, windmills and dress patterns? Coffins and pre-Volstead refreshments seem to be the only articles of commerce not being sold these days by radio, at prices which are advertised to be the lowest in the memory of the oldest living inhabitant.

"One of the best known of these nuisance stations reported the first week in February that it had in a month sold about 45,000 pieces of dress goods, amounting to aproximately 175,000 yards. Figured in mileage, this amounts to 99 4/13 miles of dress goods.

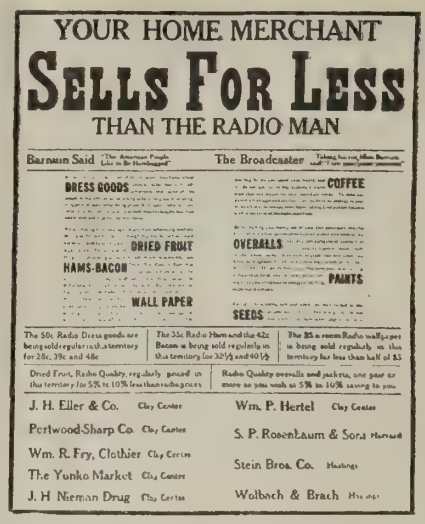
"Just what effect is this having on the small town retailer? Are enough of his customers taking advantage of these bargains to make any appreciable inroads on his regular trade? What is going to be the outcome of it all?

"So far as Commercial News can ascertain, selling by radio is and will be far less negligible than such forms of competition as the mail order houses, chain stores or peddlers. In fact, the whole situation by a number of hustling retailers is being turned into one of the best opportunities for a new advertising appeal that has turned up for a long time and is being termed a blessing in disguise for those who are awake to the situation.

"The hundreds of thousands of radio sets in the small towns and the farms of the Middle West for eight months of the year have become what are probably the greatest single source of entertainment. There is no doubt of the intense interest created by the radio, despite the efforts of some broadcasters to turn the freedom of the air to their own enrichment.

"With the people of every community having their lives broadened by the magic of radio, what better subject can the merchant have to discuss in his local advertising? And what is more important, what better selling argument can possibly be opened to him than the comparison he can make between the prices of the radio retailers and his own store?

"Possibly a few instances of comparative prices offered consumers will make the latter point clearer. One of the best known stations, not far from St. Joseph, recently put on an active selling on cans of smoked salt, for use in butchering on the farm. It offered two cans of a good quality of smoked salt for $2.50, postage prepaid. Orders were accepted for not less than two cans.



"One Iowa farmer fell for this great bargain in smoked salt and bought his two cans for $2.50. After getting his package at the postoffice he stopped at the store of his regular merchant. The retailer noticed the package and inquired what it was. With considerable reluctance the farmer showed him what it contained and told him the price. The merchant then took the farmer to the back of the store and showed him the identical salt, only the regular price was $1 a can, and the customer was not compelled to buy more than one. Of course, this particular farmer will do a little investigating before he buys again from this 'Tall Corn' station. As every retailer of smoked salt knows, the average price to him is $8 a dozen. Just figure out the profit of Mr. Radio Retailer.

"Another radio bargain was 10 pounds of prunes for $3.50, sold only in that quantity. In St. Joseph the identical quality of prunes was being sold in 1-pound packages for 28 cents. Price, an Earlham, Ia., retailer, has been selling the same prunes at 5 pounds for $1.50.

"Aside from seeds, considerable emphasis was laid by the radio retailers in February and January on three dress patterns selling for $5. After inspecting samples of these patterns, one wholesale dress goods buyer in St. Joseph stated that he could buy merchandise of the same type and vintage in New York for 10 cents the yard, although it had been many years since he had had any of it in stock. A touch of comedy was injected into the dress goods phase of radio selling when a Kansas City station which has been attracted into the game offered to send four patterns of 'nice, fresh, wash goods' for $5. The announcer stated 'these are not antique patterns of obsolete materials, but the season's goods.' There was a chance for a snappy comeback from Iowa, but none has been reported.

"Some factors in the radio industry have indicated their belief that the radio commission recently authorized by Congress and named by President Coolidge will have much to say about the mistake of broadcasting privileges and the monopoly of the ether by objectionable advertising schemes, but whether this is done or not, the progressive merchant need not wait for federal intervention to come to his relief, because meeting radio competition is one of the least difficult problems he has to face. He has only to community how he is consistently under to do one thing, tell the people of selling the broadcasters.

"The remedy of course is advertising

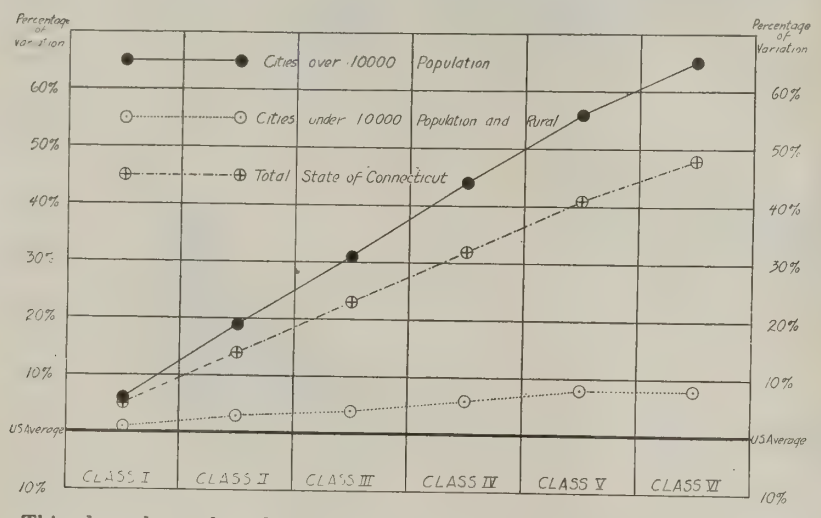
KEY TO CONSUMER BUYING ABILITY



Statistical Rating of Connecticut Counties and Cities for Products of General Appeal, Graded in S Major Classes of Quality and Cost—An Original Simplified and Tested Formula from Basic Data

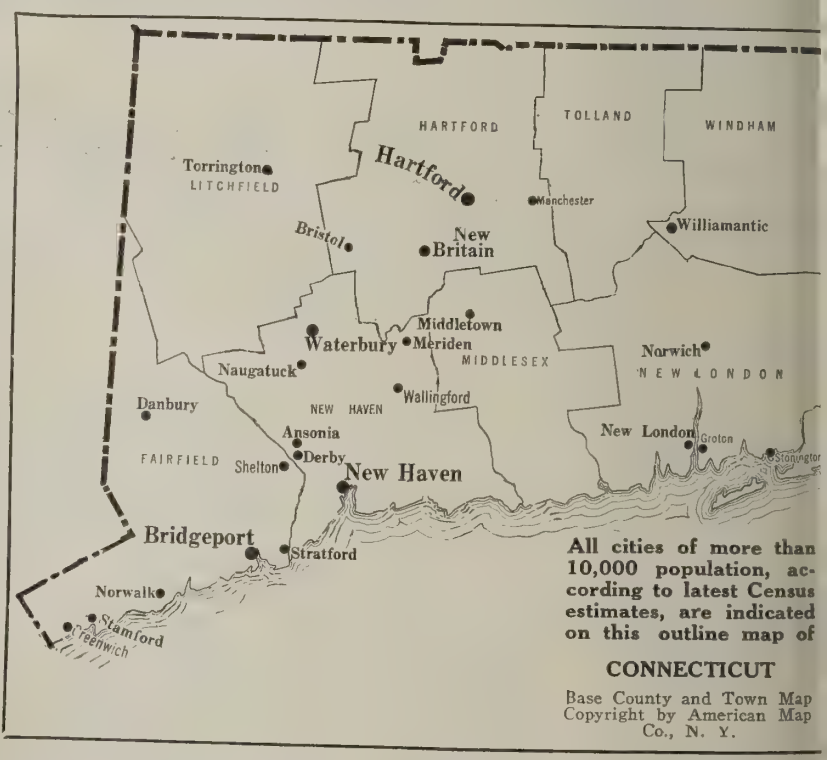
ABILITY to buy anything useful, ornamental, or pleasing that the market offers is portrayed in the tables and charts for the State of Connecticut, presented this week in EDITOR & PUBLISHER'S series on consumer buying ability. The map bears out the impression that the figures and the upward curving lines demonstrate—a compact market, well studded with rich cities set in a farming area that produces goods of high value and quick marketability.

In every one of the six classes of products covered by this survey, Connecticut holds alluring possibilities for the man with goods to sell, from shaving creams to custom-built automobiles. Like all other states and communities, it ranks with the average in its capacity to consume the normal amount of everyday necessities, but as the scale of value of products ranges higher, Connecticut's ability to absorb them more than keeps pace. It is proportionately a better market for the higher-priced luxuries than it is for those products which hover on the border between luxury and necessity. This is true even in the rural districts, which, weighed on the same scale as are the cities, show a composite purchasing power which closely parallels the more densely populated areas.

This chart shows the relative variation for the State of Connecticut above or below the United States average for cities of 10,000 or more population, cities of less than 10,000 and rural population and the entire State of each merchandising class.

It is a state where the advertising channels to the riches of the market are direct and limited in number. Connecticut has always been known among newspaper men as a state which is intensely interested in news of itself. It is one of the first states to develop an intra-state telegraph service, and its newspapers covering in their news columns the activities of the smallest hamlets as well as the minute-to-minute business of city folks, have a circulation that reaches to every corner of their little realm. The manufacturer or sales executive who has been reading these articles, of which this is the sixth, know that the figures give an approximate percentage for each locality of the proportion of their product which each community can absorb.



To check this percentage against the proportion of the advertising appropriation which is going into the given communities is relatively simple in this state, where the city and trading area circulation of the daily newspapers is available to inquirers.

Papers Which Neglect Their Interests for Selfish Groups on Road to Failure, E. J. Lynett Tells Pennsylvania Publishers in Search of Controversial Questions

President Paul R. Eyerly of the Pennsylvania Newspaper Publishers Association asked Edward J. Lynett, publisher of the Scranton Times, to talk on some controversial subjects at the summer meeting last week to "warm up" the discussion period. Mr. Lynett's remarks follow in part.

ALL of our newspapers are organized for profit. It is essential to the independence of the publisher that he should neither be deeply in debt nor so affiliated with big financial interests that either an individual, a bank or a corporation magnate can dictate the policy of the paper or steer him in a course to which he is disinclined. Not only in such an event does he lose his self-respect, but the people in this day and age are wise. If sinister influences should be apparent they soon catch on. The paper will lose its influence among the public and the situation is soon reflected in the loss of subscribers and of advertising.

The newspaper gets its greatest strength by appealing to and supporting the interests of the plain people of the community in which it is published.

A good many people believe that the day of the partisan newspaper has passed; that most of the newspapers of the country are independent and should remain independent. I do not go along with that idea. So long as the politics of this government is conducted on the party system, so long will the newspapers be divided on fundamental, economic and political lines. The so called independent newspapers in nearly every instance, line up in campaigns with one party or the other and year after year with the same party. This is as it should be. The newspaper should express the abiding convictions of its publisher in the matter of the principles and policies of government. I do not believe in the servile attitude of party organs which slavishly follow the dictates of an organization or leader whether right or wrong or that seeks to cover up dishonesty, incompetency or abuses because the offender belongs to its party. The first duty of the newspaper is to protect the people and to expose rascality and malfeasance in office no matter what the politics of the errant officer may be.

The Scranton Times during the 32 years of my ownership has never conducted a popularity contest, a gift enterprise, or any other scheme to promote circulation. It has been offered to the public simply on its merits as a newspaper at the regular subscription for the Times. In that way the paper acquires a real quality circulation. People buy it and pay for it because they want it. You are apt to infer from this that I am not in favor of schemes to inflate circulation. The inference is correct. Every year I become more and more impressed with that fact. Other newspapers in the field have given away automobiles, houses and lots, trips to Europe, watches, jewelry and other junk. It always results in advantage to the Times. It makes some new readers, often unwilling and unsympathetic readers, who eventually come to the Times. The gift enterprise or beauty contest is an extremely expensive means of getting subscribers and if you get them they do not stick.

I have always held that good local news is the very best feature that a newspaper could get. People are always more interested in what happens in the towns with which they are familiar and to people that they know than in more important events in remote portions of the earth. There are exceptions of course, such as the epochal adventure of Charles A. Lindbergh and of Chamberlin and Levine in blazing the way for aerial navigation across the ocean. But for solid every day, all round the year service, give me a faithful, competent and loyal local staff. I have heard publishers complain that the reporters of today are not as lively nor energetic as those of the olden times. I have noticed no deterioration in my staff. Perhaps there's a reason for the complaint. As a rule the reporter is the most poorly paid man about the establishment. Give him at least as much wages as you pay your printers and pressmen and a word of commendation when he does good work and you may note an improvement.

I don't like what we ordinarily call features. The alleged fun in the comic strip is to me flat, stale and insipid and yet they appear in my paper to a limited extent because the other fellows use them and because there appears to be a popular demand for them. I have on several occasions tested the relative popularity of the strips we use and the replies come in by the thousand showing that people are interested in them. The sob sister and the preacher stuff and the gushing replies to lovelorn youths are an abomination. I have managed to worry along without them up to this time.

There is no more important subject to the publisher than advertising. It is our bread and meat and cake and pie. Those of us who print papers above sixteen pages in size do not get the cost of the white paper we use out of our circulation department. All the rest, the deficit and the cost of newsprint, payroll in all departments, the light, heat, power, insurance, depreciation on building and machinery and the profit if any, must come out of the advertising. It is the only commodity we have to sell.

Seriously, we don't know the value of our goods. We don't get the value of our goods. We don't appreciate the tremendous potency of publicity for the promotion of business both to the retailer and the manufacturer. It is a miracle of modern progress. It is a psychological giant in its effect upon the people.

Yet the average publisher knowing that he is not getting the revenue he should, sits down and broods for a year, fearful of the loss of business, before he takes his courage in his hands and announces an increase of rates. Of course he gets it. Ten to one he doesn't lose a single account. If one or two drop by the wayside they come back sheepishly in a week or two and sign contracts at the new rate. They are not advertising because you are a good fellow nor from public spirit nor to help along the paper. They are advertising because they you in their business. They have to to you.

Don't hesitate to raise rates. ought to get enough out of your pub tion so that you will have at least a petence when the time comes for yo retire and have a good deal of fun i meantime.

Publishers should be especially of the advertiser or advertising ag which under the mask of co-opera seeks to have the newspaper set them in business in the town or expand exploit their business among the dea by letters or personal interviews, or tribution of printed matter that want the paper to print and distribut its own expense. I believe in co-op tion within limits but after all what buy is space in your newspaper and your personal service as a salesman.

Better Ads Produce Bigger Profits

GREATER attractiveness to your advertisements can be secured and their pulling power materially increased by using bright, new display typelines every day. This is why the advertisements of many leading advertisers are now set the Ludlow way.

Distinctive typefaces, symmetrical in design and always-new, are a prime essential in creating ads that produce more business. Ludlow typefaces are freshly cast every time. They constantly assure a uniform, legible, clean-cut impression. They are not compressed to meet the limitations of any machine, but are full-width and expertly designed to reflect greater individuality. To these characteristics of all Ludlow lines may be added the superior beauty of Ludlow italics which have the full-kerning effect, but with no kerns to break off. There are also the beautiful Ludlow swash characters fully supported from beneath, with no danger of breakage. Then, too, by the Ludlow method of composition, you have all the advantages of hand-spacing your words and lines as carefully as any compositor could space them with foundry type. All these factors account for Ludlow-set pages creating better business.

The Ludlow provides unlimited quantities of type in slugs, in any size up to full-width 72 point, and even 84 point caps, thus enabling you to provide your advertisers with only first-choice faces.

There are many other reasons why the Ludlow will prove a valuable merchandising factor in your plant. Let us send you the complete facts.

LUDLOW QUALITY SLUG COMPOSITION

When weary eyes turn hopelessly away . . .

EYES that have seen the drama of a lifetime surge and ebb. Eyes that have grown dim with watching and waiting; with laughter and with grieving. Eyes that have yearned with tender care over the oncoming generations and then have seen themselves pushed with gentle ruthlessness aside.

And now they dwell apart, though not alone, in a world peopled with memories, and listen for the rustle of the pages that bring them their only contact with the ceaseless flow of human endeavor and aspiration and passion; of triumph and disaster about them.

What tragedy when that last link with life is broken! When the one last window grows cloudy and dim.

"I thought," said one gentle, trembling voice, "that I would have to give up reading altogether, and then this new type came——"

Can you do less than give them the chronicle of the day, printed in type that life-worn eyes can read?

THROUGH WHICH LENS IS YOUR PAPER READ?

After several years of investigation and experimentation, the Mergenthaler Linotype Company announces the introduction of a new newspaper body face. This new Ionic is an exceptionally readable face. The openness of the rounded letters—the height and width of the lower case—the clear-cut capitals—the size and fullness of the figures—the absence of marked contrast between thick and thin—the well-fitted units—the standard letter-count—all of these things go to make this new type a most desirable newspaper face. There are no "pin-holes" or sharp corners to fill up with ink; no fine lines to break down in stereotyping. The even color of the character is particularly adapted to the "roughness" of newspaper stock. The outstanding advantage of the new face is its conservation of vision. The even tone throughout is restful to the eyes without being monotonous. There is enough variation to avoid tiresomeness, yet not enough to be disconcerting. A happy medium has been effected. Various degrees of leading can be used to advantage, or the lines may be cast on a solid body. The comparative shortness of the ascenders and descenders gives good legibility even when set solid. The first paper to adopt the new face was the Evening News, of Newark, N. J. After a trial of several weeks, the publisher of the paper is

The British delegation of trade-union representatives, who came here on Tuesday at the invitation of "The London Daily Mail" to study reasons for the disparity between the high wages and prosperous living conditions of the American worker and their own lower wage standards, gained considerable light in a tour of several industrial establishments in Brooklyn yesterday.

They were curious to know how it was that the average wage of the American toiler virtually doubled that of his British brother, and how it was possible for industries here to offer such fat envelopes to their employees and at the same time compete successfully in world markets. After a study of the Brooklyn Edison plant and the factory methods of the Mergenthaler Linotype Company in Brooklyn, the delegates remarked that one of the vital reasons for the disparity was that the American worker was capable of producing and actually did produce more than the British toiler in a given time.

This he was enabled to do, they learned, because of the high standards of efficiency obtaining here, mass production methods, the utter perfection of organization for which the American industrialist seems always to be striving, and labor-saving devices evident on every hand. The comments of the delegates were voiced by Sir Percival Philips, special correspondent of "The Daily Mail"; Fenton MacPherson, of the same newspaper, and Sir William Mosses, J. P., who had a prominent part in the British Ministry during the war.

Many noted that were offered by the American worker much more and that were more beneficial. This was the result, he observed, of the frequent scrapping of plants here to make way for expansion and development. His countrymen are loath, he said, to tear down a building that has served twenty years or more.

Mr. Mosses dwelt on the turnover [illegible] "that with this high rate of production the American worker earns his pay."

"And this is how we are permitting the British worker to learn for himself," explained Sir Percival, "the reason for the differences [illegible] on both sides of the water. very twelve months usually in December.

"The sheet enclosed gives a fairly good idea of the information it reveals when the figures are entered. Totals of the expenditures, it will be observed, are shown in the first column, and are detailed in the second and third columns under 'department expense details.'

"I direct your special attention to the reverse side of the sheet — 'Important Details for Comparison,' which is very valuable, or at least should be, to the publisher who is interested beyond the information as to the net income for the month."

While not noted by Mr. Johnson, another aspect of the information on the reverse of the main sheet is that the publisher can use the figures there supplied in discussions with department heads without revealing the revenue on the face. It is reproduced on this page and is adequately described in the caption.

"While this form is an improvement over the one we had used for a period of about ten years, we find that it still can be improved," Mr. Johnson comments. "It is very difficult to devise a form of this sort and not overlook some important details. I don't claim that this form is perfect, nor that it is original. It is a composite form, made to meet our requirements, resulting from experience and after inspecting similar forms used by a number of newspapers."

Behind this one-sheet picture of the month's success or failure of course lies a complete and efficient system of keeping the daily records in such form that their transcription is accomplished without disrupting the necessary routine. This series will make no effort to tackle the subject of newspaper bookkeeping, by hand or machine. Almost any of the numerous systems and variations of the old double-entry plan can be adapted to give the publisher whatever information he wants, in as great detail as his budget for the accounting department can afford. Not a few newspapers doing a gross business of nearly half a million dollars a year and conducted with no more than ordinary efficiency keep their accounting system up to the second with a competent bookkeeper-cashier, assisted by one girl to keep circulation cash records and another to keep track of classified accounts. Less than $5,000 a year is paid in salaries to people handling in the aggregate 100 times that amount and the publisher can obtain on a few moments' notice the minutiae of any branch of his business, with a history covering two or three years back if he desires it. That may be unusual and probably represents a minimum of expense for the results achieved, but it can be approximated by a publisher or business manager who understands what he wants well enough to organize to obtain it. As the usual budget amount available for the accounting department is in the neighborhood of 5 per cent of total operating expense, according to recent surveys, it appears that the publisher has plenty of latitude in his demand for information. Failure to obtain it usually indicates a defect in the organization, rather than in the personnel of the accounting department. Accountants are generally above the average in intelligence, almost fanatical in their desire to show the "boss" a quick and accurate job, and the machine systems on the market, generally speaking, demand little ingenuity of their operators once the ground lines are laid.

Need for this quick and accurate information was impressed upon business men generally and newspaper publishers especially by the exactions of the war income tax laws and costs that mounted with deadly speed and it is being further impressed by the economic situation confronting newspapers this year. Advertising revenue, generally speaking, is running behind that of last year, while expenses remain substantially the same or higher. The publisher who is not watching production costs daily and comparing their course with past experience by means of accurate records is piloting his craft toward reefs where the past can't help him and the present and future exist only for his destruction.

REPORTERS EXTRADICTED

Massachusetts Governor Signs Papers in Thompson Case—Appeal Taken

Governor Fuller of Massachusetts on June 20 signed extradition papers for the removal of Fred H. Thompson, Boston Post reporter, to New Hampshire, for trial. Thompson is charged with having procured the larceny from the plant of the Rumford Press at Concord of copies of The Atlantic Monthly containing an article by Governor Smith of New York.

Counsel for Thompson announced that he would petition the Supreme Court for a writ of habeas corpus, which would delay extradition until the higher court had passed on the issues involved.

GETS LIBEL JUDGMENT

John Martin, rancher, who obtained judgment for $12,000 against the Houston Chronicle in a libel suit tried at San Antonio, recently was awarded $20,000 on re-trial of the case. The suit grew out of a story which, a few years ago, had to do with possible origin of the hoof-and-mouth disease which was epidemic around Houston for a time.

ADVERTISING'S "WHY?"

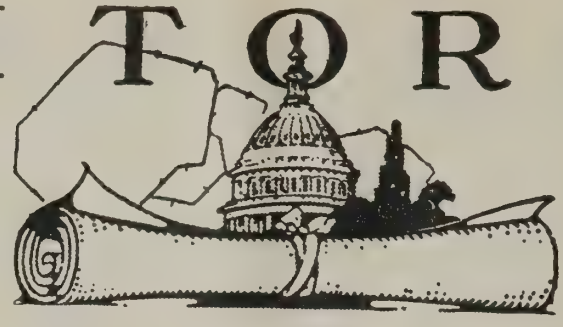
PHYSICALLY and spiritually, the International Advertising Association at Denver will stand next week on a mountain top, looking down upon what has been done in the past and what may be attempted in the future. The vista down the past twenty-three years is pleasant; one achievement alone of the many that have marked the first quarter-century of the organization's life would have been ample to justify it—the advertising structure has been purged of much of the chicanery and misrepresentation that was rife then and rare today. In this advance, the leadership of the International Advertising Association, and its predecessor, the Associated Advertising Clubs of the World, has been unceasing and invaluable.

That battle has been won. Exploitation of the success, still under I.A.A. supervision, is largely routine and in capable hands, and business can find more important work for the tremendous potential energy that inheres in the association.

Advertising, a comparatively new business force, has kept the wheels of commerce turning for ten years at a rate never before believed possible. Like high-voltage electricity, its power has been turned into profits, and disasters have been comparatively few, even though the nature of the power has been a deep mystery to most of its employers.

It is this mystery that the country's business wishes to dissipate. If advertising can be used by many successfully, why should failure attend its use by any? The business men now in control of the International Advertising Association believe that the next great task of their group is to answer this question, to learn the facts about advertising.

Intelligently gathered and applied, knowledge of advertising performance under the many methods represented in the I.A.A. membership should be instrumental in a few years in removing much of the advertising technique from the empiric to the scientific realm. It is a job worthy of the best thought that organized advertisers can give it.



Sport reporting is probably the most accurate that appears in the newspaper, due in large measure to the fact that the general public is better grounded in a knowledge of sport, both historical and current, than in any other department of interest.

AN UNFAIR CRITICISM

"WHY do the newspapers not print the truth about Mexico?" queries the editor of America, the well-known Catholic weekly review, and then asserts: "The undoubted censorship, the 'interests,' bigotry, pacifist propaganda, hostility to our Government, public interest, have all been conjectured as reasons why one of the biggest news stories of the day is not being printed." The editor describes a frightful state of affairs in Mexico and declares that the American press has not printed it but have "meekly" accepted the usual fortnightly official statement that the revolution has been crushed. Where are fearless correspondents to tell the world that the revolution is now in full swing, with horrors on every side?

To Editor & Publisher it has seemed that the American press has presented the story of Mexico, as it has developed to date, very fairly and in quite remarkable detail and America's inference that editors are deliberately suppressing this news or that correspondents are afraid to write it to us seems nothing short of a shockingly narrow opinion. What is the big story that America believes is being held back from the public? The daily press has published, in news style and not as propaganda, every valid fact that is suggested by America. Perhaps it is true that a great story does lie in Mexico, but if so it is not being neglected because correspondents are afraid to write it or because any editor would hesitate to print it for the reasons suggested in America's unfair criticism.

It is now time to call a staff meeting to find the best way around the seemingly inevitable Summer linage slump.

Greater love hath no man than this, that a man lay down his life for his friends.—St. John, XV; 13.

INTRODUCING A SPECIALTY

IN one of the great metropolitan districts of our country, where some five millions of people lived and strove and had their being, this writer once attempted to introduce a grocery specialty. It was a brand of Dutch breakfast cocoa, in a neat package priced to give the commission merchant his usual bit, the retailer a good twenty per cent profit and the consumer more cocoa for the money than he had been used to getting. The product was excellent in every way.

We took four young salesmen out into the district and proposed to cover every grocery store in a six months' canvass. The salesmen received drawing accounts and a commission on sales. All they had to show were samples of the goods, some cheap counter advertising signs and a page proof of an advertisement which would come out in a magazine of alleged national distribution within a few weeks.

Our sales talk was based on (1) the high percentage of profit for the retailer (2) the excellence of the product, which we said would repeat and (3) the prospect that the magazine advertisement would create a demand.

The way the grocers of that city received this sales talk was one of the most interesting and instructive experiences of a life-time. We discovered that the old-fashioned grocer, who knows what he is selling and buys merchandise so he may intelligently cater to the taste of his particular clientele, is well-nigh extinct. The average independent grocer, although railing at chain-store competition, copies chain-store methods as best he can and has become a mere automaton, passing out package goods to his customers on their call and with nothing to say on the subject of their choice. He recommends nothing, if he can avoid it. He groans because his profit on certain lines of merchandise has been cut to a narrow shred, but when goods are in demand he feels he must carry them.

Of course, our sales crew went up against terrific resistance but we succeeded in selling a case or a half-case to about one out of five stores called upon. In many instances the grocer would put it on his shelf more to get rid of a persistent salesman than anything else. Naturally, he would be sympathetic because we would say that our goods were not on sale at chain-stores and that we were interested to see the independent grocer make a fair profit. In many instances the grocer would be talked into the notion that he might push a small quantity of our packages over his counter, whether there was a demand or not, and that the goods themselves might be so meritorious as to repeat.

Our sales force did not earn much money and it was difficult to hold it together, but in the course of time about half of the city was covered. In the early stages of the campaign we besought the manufacturer to give us just a small appropriation for local newspaper advertising. To us, the fact became as plain as a pikestaff that the proposed magazine advertising was to the grocer a far-away, shadowy appeal. It might help or not. He had heard the song before and it did not convince him. But he would tell us that if the cocoa were to be advertised in the local papers, and he would usually name one or two of them, it would have a chance in the race. In fact, many grocers would tell us that they would feel safe to sell the goods if they were advertised in local newspapers. Despite this obvious condition the manufacturer with whom we were dealing would make no newspaper allowance. He had, he said, put his money into the magazine and nothing was left for the daily press. He seemed satisfied to p small quantities of his goods in one out of stores, believing that their merit would start the rolling and ultimately give him regular sales.

The campaign was not a success—it was a dis failure. Every grocer who received our stuff c to feel that he had been "stuck" by high-powe salesmanship after the goods had littered his s for a month or two. He did not pass them to customers. There was no active call for them. three months we knew that the possibility of considerable amount of repeat business was a figm of our imagination. Some of the cocoa came b to the commission merchant and life became j one quarrel after another for all concerned. Des all this unpleasantness our stubborn manufactu refused to see the light and buy the newspaper sp we recommended. His good cocoa was never m keted.

The experience was an eye-opener for this wri and is the basis of the reference so often made the columns of Editor & Publisher: Advertis which does not register in the mind of the avera consumer and which does not positively co-ordin with distribution is mere waste. The best advert ing medium is the daily newspaper and if you not think so just put some samples of an unadvertis grocery specialty in a bag and spend one day calli on the grocery trade.

The editor who induces his readers to write brief letters for publication is assured of good editorials.

GOOD NEWSPAPER MEN

A SURVEY made under the direction of t University of Pennsylvania's Wharton Scho of Finance and Commerce shows some interes ing figures in relation to the editorial staffs of dai newspapers in the United States. For instance, colle graduates comprise 52 per cent of editorial worker compared with about 9 per cent of 25 years ag Of 340 men filling positions as managing editor, chi editorial writer, city editor, news editor or head co reader, on 70 newspapers, 218 reported as colle men, the proportion among managing editors beir 68 per cent.

But editors interviewed by the surveyors frank stated that while the college graduate was ordinari superior as a writer he rarely developed the "nose fo news" that seemed to come naturally to the boy wh starts as a copy chaser, becomes a reporter and the an executive. The explanation given is that th college man is ambitious to be known as a write the non-college man as an investigator.

To the question, "All other things being equal, d you give preference to the college man when hirin men?" there were affirmative replies from 84 pe cent of the editors and a variety of comments, on of which was, "We no longer hire non-college men, and another who said, "We regard college men witl suspicion as more likely to have fallen into writin ruts and lax habits."

Another objection expressed by several editors wa that the college man overrates himself during th first few years out of college, "and wants to be a managing editor or columnist right off the bat.' Opinion was divided on the value of schools o journalism, some editors praising them highly and others expressing a preference for talented high school graduates.

For our part we must confess that the subject of preference of college or non-college men in journalism has become wearisome. It is really all bosh and we think that colleges that are stirring up interest in these comparisons merely to sell themselves to aspiring youth are in small business. The fact is that the more one knows, no matter how or where he gets the knowledge, the better he is equipped to do newspaper work. Another fact is that good newspaper men are those who have the right spirit for the work, good ideas and a natural ability to express thought. The woods are full of wonderfully educated men who cannot articulate and of blabbers who know nothing. The way to find a good newspaper man is to give a candidate a chance to report and write and if he makes good hold onto him with both hands, for such men are not too plentiful.

BUILDING NEWSPAPER CIRCULATION

Charlotte Observer's Town Hall Ready for Use—Kansas City Star Offering Free Course in Piano Playing—Quincy (Ill.) Herald-Whig Circulators at Dinner Party

M. H. BRANDON, circulation manager of the Charlotte (N. C.) Observer, believes that one of the biggest factors in creating good will for the Observer will be the recently opened Town Hall on the third floor of the paper's new building. The hall measures approximately 60 by 160 feet.

"The Hall is now available to the public and is offered without charge to all churches, civic and women's organizations, business groups, and in fact almost any kind of meeting except political and private business," Mr. Brandon states. "Several civic and church organizations have already taken advantage of the Observer's offer by reserving certain nights for meetings of their groups and it is probable that the Town Hall will be almost steadily engaged.

"Free picture shows for children of Charlotte will be given on Saturday afternoons. There are two motion picture machines installed in a steel booth in the Hall and there is an excellent screen on the stage. Each Saturday afternoon there are four shows, each of one hour and thirty minutes duration. Six reels of feature are shown and two reels of comedy. These films are approved by a member of the Better Films Committee.

"Admission to these shows is obtained through tickets of admission, one of which is given to each subscriber upon payment to the carrier boy of the 20c weekly subscription rate. These weekly shows promise to be a great feature of the Town Hall and will enable many Charlotte children, who might otherwise be unable to attend pictures, to enjoy the entertaining and educational programs which will be put before them."

The honor of riding in the automobile with Col. Lindbergh on the occasion of his visit to Brooklyn last week, was offered by the Brooklyn Eagle to the boy or girl representing any public or parochial school in the borough who wrote the best letter of 200 words on the subject, "Why I Admire Col. Lindbergh." Nearly 10,000 letters reached the Eagle office. Some ambitious young writers even wired their entries, and some fond parents chartered taxicabs to get their offsprings, contributions into the Eagle office in time to be judged. Two winners, a boy and a girl, were picked.

"The competition excited more interest than any conducted by the Eagle in the 85 years of its existence," an Eagle official stated.

Beginning last Sunday, the Kansas City Star inaugurated a vacation course in free piano lessons, using the same system taught in the public schools. There will be lessons every day on the music page, radio talks and free personal instruction by the public school teachers of the system.

Eighty-five mothers of British Columbia received boxes of flowers on Mother's Day when the Vancouver (B. C.) Sun undertook to find the mother with the largest family of living sons. Mrs. Christina Beckman, of Lower Nicalo, near Merritt, B. C., who has 12 sons of 21 years and under, won the grand prize of cut flowers. Other boxes of blooms were sent by motor stage, train and boat to all mothers with seven sons or more. Many of the mothers live in pioneer homes in the picturesque wilderness of the Pacific Coast province. A special Mother's Day card of greeting was sent by the Sun to all mothers—numbering more than 200—whose names had been submitted during the contest.

What the Syracuse (N. Y.) Herald considers one of its most successful contests was that for the selection of the "Clara Bow of Syracuse." The contest was conducted by the Herald in conjunction with the Eckel Theatre. Miss Mary Hillebrand won the first prize of $25 as the most perfect double of the film star.

Members of the circulation staff of the Quincy (Ill.) Herald-Whig were guests at a dinner in the Elks club recently, presided over by O. R. Myers, circulation manager. J. Greene MacKenzie, manager of the Hannibal, Mo., bureau, was elected secrtary. C. F. Eichenauer, editor, was a speaker at the chicken dinner served the members of the staff.

In connection with "Elmer Gantry," running serially in the Kansas City Journal-Post, that paper is offering cash prizes of $25, $15 and $10 for the three best 200-word reviews of the story.

The Worcester (Mass.) Telegram-Gazette has completed and placed in operation their city suburban sub-station home delivery carrier system handling over 60,000 copies daily within the 18 miles zone. E. D. Dolhenty is circulation manager.

TWO AMERICANS BEHIND CHINESE NEWS STAGE

Mr. and Mrs. Prohme Handling Nationalist Publicity—Hope to Counteract "Stupid Propaganda Controlled by British

With 5,000 American marines now in China, war news from the Orient appears certain to come back to the front pages of American newspapers, as the enthusiasm for Capt. Charles A. Lindbergh dies down.

And, to those newspaper editors in this country assigned to handle the story as it comes to them at the telegraph desk, it may be of interest to know that two important scene shifters behind the stage of Chinese news are Americans.

Mr. and Mrs. William Prohme have been handling the publicity of the Chinese nationalist movement for about a year and a half, Mr. Prohme wrote EDITOR & PUBLISHER from Shanghai in a letter dated May 2, and received in New York this week.

"The difficulties have been enormous," Mr. Prohme wrote, "financially and otherwise. But we've tried to stick to facts and information and have kept out hokum of all kinds from that part of the publicity work we are handling, which is the Nationalist News Agency, and from the papers we have started for the movement inside China.

"We are, of course, Americans. My wife's training was in Illinois, mine rather scattered about the country. I was for nine years with the Hearst service, for six of these as editorial writer on the San Francisco Examiner.

"I am at present in Shanghai trying, feebly because of financial handicaps and also because of the horrible war neurosis which has seized Shanghai, to counteract the stupid propaganda which the British control here and which, I'm afraid, sadly affects the judgment of most of our American correspondents here."

In its issue of Feb. 26, EDITOR & PUBLISHER described the copy being sent out by the Nationalist News Agency, and quoted Eugene Young, foreign editor of the New York World, as praising the work of those in charge, then unknown.

L. B. WOOD PROMOTED

Oklahoma City News M. E. Joining N. Y. Telegram as News Editor

Lee B. Wood, for more than two years managing editor of Oklahoma City (Okla.) News, has been promoted to news editor of the New York Telegram, it was announced June 15.

RAYMOND J. DYER

LEE B. WOOD

Raymond J. Dyer will succeed Wood as managing editor of the News.

The New York Telegram recently was purchased by the Scripps-Howard Newspapers from the estate of Frank Munsey.

Wood came to the News early in 1925 from the Cleveland Press. A native of Pennsylvania, he had had experience on newspapers in Chicago and Cleveland, and also, following service in the war, had been for sometime a member of the staff of the Paris edition of the Chicago Tribune. He is 34 years old.

Dyer, the new managing editor of the News, was born in Kansas, and is a graduate of the University of Kansas. Before joining the staff of the News a year ago, he had worked for the Kansas City Kansan, the St. Joseph (Mo.) Gazette and the Oklahoma City Times.

HE SPIKES GOLD "BOOMS"

Eureka, Cal., Reporter Is Expert Assayist—Alert for Hoaxes

Stories of gold booms, which have been prevalent in many points of California, Nevada and Oregon since the famous Weepah strike, have not made their appearance in Northwestern California on account of the presence of a veteran assayer on the news staffs of one of the papers. William H. Gallagher, 65-year-old reporter of the Eureka (Cal.) Humboldt Standard, got his assaying experience in the hectic Comstock days in Nevada, and is still rated as one of the best metallurgical experts in the West.

Since the Weepah boom Gallagher has been handed hundreds of samples of ore supposed to contain gold, but his ruthless microscope and chemical retort have invariably "killed" the hopes of the miners for "pay dirt" and the newspapers for front page stories.

"As a mining man I want to see the boys strike it rich, and as a newspaperman I am desirious of my associates getting 'the big story,'" said Gallagher in commenting on the situation. "However, miners and newspapers both want the truth, and as long as I can give my employers the benefit of my experience we are not going to hoax the reading public with any false 'boom' stories."

—Roger F. Owsley, Magazine Space Buyer of the George Batten Company, Inc., says in "Printers' Ink":

"Two Types of Circulation"

"After all is said and done aren't there really only two distinct types of circulation? One we might call advertiser's circulation and the other publisher's circulation. Advertiser's circulation is that which is gotten, in so far as it is humanly possible to do so, for the sole purpose of making it profitable for an advertiser to buy that circulation and make it pay a profit for him. Publisher's circulation on the other hand is that which is gotten so that at least numerically or proportionately that publisher can crowd on the band wagon and carry a 'Me too' sign."

The Brooklyn Standard Union circulation has another distinction—that is reader circulation.

Never did a prize, premium or contest buy any of it.

WOMEN IN ADVERTISING AND JOURNALISM

Marshall, Mo., Woman at 85 Still Contributes to Local Paper—Buffalo Newspaper Women Elect—Women's Ad Club Formed in Los Angeles

THE undisputed record in Missouri and perhaps in the United States in service for one newspaper is held by

Mrs. J. M. Patterson

Mrs. J. M. Patterson, 85 years old, of Marshall, Mo.

Mrs. Patterson has been a regular contributor to the Marshall Daily Democrat-News for 60 years. Perhaps more remarkable than her length of service is the fact that at the age of 85 she is still furnishing excellent copy.

Until his death 20 years ago Mrs. Patterson's husband owned an interest in and was editor of the Democrat-News. Mrs. Patterson began newspaper writing when Mr. Patterson first became editor. She was capable and enjoyed the work. When her husband died Mrs. Patterson was retained on the staff.

For the past five years she has handled her work at home by use of the telephone.

Besides her newspaper work Mrs. Patterson does all her own housework. She lives with her only surviving son. One son died several years ago after having been an invalid twenty years.

The summer outing of the New England Woman's Press Association was held on June 15 at Cedar Hill, Waltham, Mass. Miss Helena B. Shipman, newly chosen president.

Marian De Forest was recently re-elected committee chairman of the Scribblers' Club of Buffalo; Mrs. Frank T. Sullivan was again named as secretary-treasurer and Miss Anna L. Harlow, Mrs. Frederick Willard Kendall and Mrs. John W. Bush make up the executive committee. This club is composed of the newspaper women of Buffalo.

Organization of the Woman's Advertising Club of Los Angeles has just been perfected, with 65 active members. The group will meet weekly. Temporary officers elected were: Mrs. Gertrude Maynard, president; Mrs. Elsa Beregassy, secretary, and Mrs. Jessamine Adkinson, treasurer. Rosalind Bates heads the committee appointed to draw up a constitution, and Marion Lois is in charge of clubhouse affairs.

Alice Spinney, a reporter for the Worcester (Mass.) Telegram, has been elected vice-president of the Tau Kappa Alpha, the honorary journalistic society of the University of New Hampshire.

Mrs. Irene Simms Shields has returned to her post as advertising manager of the Monroe (La.) News-Star, following an operation.

Altha Leah Bass, a member of the Chicago Daily News staff of book reviewers, recently had her first novel, "Neosho," published by Burton.

Twenty-five seniors out of a class of 50 who received their B.Litt. degrees from the Pulitzer School of Journalism, Columbia University, on June 1, stepped into newspaper, magazine advertising or publicity jobs, according to a record in the hands of Dr. A. S. Will, associate professor at the Pulitzer School. Many of these students assumed the responsibilities of their positions before commencement and were not able to attend commencement exercises for that reason.

REPORTER CHAPERONS ELOPERS

And It Made a Good Yarn, for Bride Was Governor's Daughter

When the pretty daughter of Governor Fred W. Green of Michigan recently took it into her head to elope with the boy of her choice, the Lansing State Journal managed to score a real "scoop" on the rest of the state with an exclusive "inside" story of the event written by a staff member who chauffeured the couple on their thrilling trip into Ohio, "stood up" with the bridegroom, and presumably had the first opportunity to kiss the bride.

The heroine of the escapade was Miss Helen Nancy "Peggy" Green, the hero was Norvell Tyrrell, and the newspaperman was Trevor L. "Ted" Christie. The boy and girl, principals in the affair, were both students at Michigan State College and Christie, who was a student there not so long ago himself, happened to be sharing Tyrrell's room at his fraternity house when the youthful lovers began plans for their dash into matrimony. Christie became the only confidante of the pair and when all preparations were complete it was decided to take him along.

What's the matter with young Perkins?

THE neighbors think he's crazy. You can't blame them. Respectable young husbands and fathers don't ordinarily come dancing in from the 5:15 like a hamadryad on mid-summer's eve . . leastwise not in Rogers Park.

How can they know that something BIG has come into the life of Morton V. Perkins and family of two . . . that he's just received his first big RAISE . . . that now the Perkinses can have a CAR? Yet, that's just it. The boss has listened to reason and from now on bigger and better pay checks are to make possible a smart 1927 model for the Perkins household.

But make no mistake about it. Perkins isn't going to buy A car . . . any old car . . . he's going to buy THE car. Perkins reads The Chicago Daily News every evening. Automobile advertising in this effective medium has made him brand conscious. He is now ready to deliver himself "pre-sold" to somebody's salesroom.

Average Daily Net Paid Circulation for Six Months End

Thousands of young fellows in Chicago and suburbs are on the brink of the BIG moment. The car they'll buy will be the car they're being sold now. The consistent week-day leadership of The Daily News in automobile display advertising is the best evidence that manufacturers and dealers find it the most effective week-day medium through which to reach the Perkinses of Chicago and suburbs during the important period when that first car is still but a rosy prospect.

Descriptive Copy Placed by George Washington Used in Brooklyn Eagle Promotion—Collection Boxes Aid K. C. Star—Drive for 7-Time Contracts in Cincinnati

AN unusual classified promotion advertisement appeared in the Brooklyn Eagle on Thursday of last week stressing the importance of using descriptive copy.

The caption read "George Washington Knew the Value of Descriptive Copy," and underneath was a facsimile of an advertisement placed in the Maryland Journal in 1773, signed by George Washington, and offering for sale 20,000 acres of land on the Ohio and Great Kanhawa rivers. An excerpt from the ad follows:

"As these lands are among the first which have been surveyed in the part of the country they lie in, it is almost needless to promise that none can exceed them in luxuriance of soil, or convenience of situation, all of them lying upon the banks either of the Ohio or the Kanhawa, and abounding with fine fish and wild fowl of various kinds, as also in most excellent meadows, many of which (by the bountiful hand of nature) are in their present state, almost fit for the scythe."

Washington's copy goes into great detail regarding terms, how many acres shall be cleared and "laid down in good grass for meadows" each year, and how many fruit trees shall be planted by each purchaser.

Under the reproduction of Washington's copy the Eagle said:

"Back in 1773 the Maryland Journal carried this advertisement. Not only is it an interesting specimen, but it also shows how important the Father of Our Country considered a detailed description when advertising his property for sale.

"Remember this when placing a Classified Ad. It may make your copy slightly longer, but ultimately it's the shortest way to reach prospective buyers.

"Classified Want Ads"

Want ad boxes in leading stores and office buildings are a great aid to the Kansas City Star's classified ad department as well as to patrons. Twenty-three of the boxes now are located throughout the city.

Advertisements and answers to advertisements may be placed in the want ad boxes. No stamp is required.

Regular collections are made. Ads going into the boxes before 9:45 each morning reach the Star's office in time for the evening edition.

Excitement ran high in the classified department of the Cincinnati Enquirer when the first contest was held among the ad-takers for the greatest number of seven-time contracts for classified insertions.

There was a tie between Miss Ione Parker and Miss Catherine Rosenstein both obtaining 98 seven-time contracts. Altogether the ad-takers obtained a total of 550 such contracts in the first week's drive.

Many of the contracts obtained were from persons who called up to make a one time insertion and by good salesmanship of the ad-takers were convinced that it was to their advantage to take the seven-time basis.

An index to all Lost and Found ads appearing in the Kansas City Star for the preceding two months is maintained at the Star office to further aid in the recovery of lost articles.

Duke Bolger, formerly of Buffalo, N. Y., and Boston, Mass., is now classified advertising manager of the New Britain (Conn.) Herald, succeeding William J. Hennessey, who has become classified advertising manager of the Hartford Times.

Distributing Center of Western North Carolina

Population
60,000 Estimate 1927
28,504 Census 1920
255,363 City, Suburban, 25-Mile Radius

No other city is situated to cover western North Carolina as effectively as Asheville,—high in the Blue Ridge Mountains.

Charlotte is 140 miles to the southeast. Greensboro and Winston-Salem are 200 miles to the northeast. Knoxville, Tennessee, across the mountains, is 130 miles west.

Type of City

There is no other city of similar size the country over with more palatial homes and hotels. This is reflected in the high grade and varied merchandise displayed in Asheville's stores.

Asheville is a wealthy community. The very beauty of the mountainous country and mild climate, aside from business opportunities, attract many rich men.

Developments around Asheville (some not in the corporate limits but actually part of the city) have been multiplying for several years. Suburbs like Biltmore Forest, Lakeview, Grove Park, typify wealth and culture.

The schools, colleges and churches are many, modern and wonderful.

Industries

Aside from local manufacturing, wholesaling, retailing, farming, fruit growing, and stock raising, the "crop" most indicative of the territory is the "tourist crop" yielding approximately $35,750,000 in 1926 from 715,000 tourists.

Asheville is the hub of celebrated resort territory, high in North Carolina's Blue Ridge Mountains — next door to Paradise.

Papers from other cities cannot get into Asheville's territory until the news is stale. And no evening paper in Asheville can get far out until the next morning.

The Copper & Brass Research Association is composed of miners and smelters in the industry as well as the fabricators of copper, brass and bronze products of all kinds.

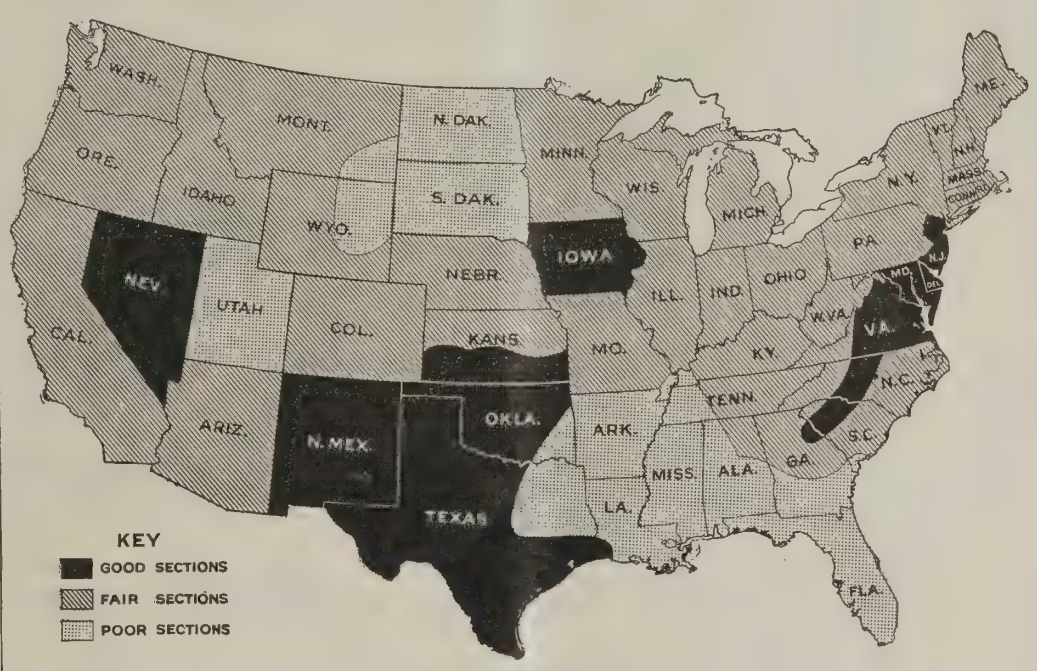
UYS IOWA FARM AT $312 AN ACRE

etired Farmer Purchases 80 Acres for $25,000

Davenport, June 25—Sale of ie first farm in Iowa in re- nt years above $300 an acre as reported this month when dward Stoltenberg, retired rmer, Davenport, purchased r his son the eighty acres wned by Herman Thiessen of urant for $25,000.

The farm is located one mile uth of Stockton, in Muscatine county, just off the proposed paved road running from olcott to Durant.



Deal on Cash Basis

Mr. Stoltenberg paid cash, ie price per acre being $312.-. The farm house is large id thoroughly modern, while ie buildings are new and well quipped.

Ed. Note—Two points in this ansaction should be noted. irst, the deal was cash, hich gives a more accurate icture of values than is posble in deals where trades gure largely. Second, Mr. toltenberg purchased the rm for his son—a move hich indicates that the comg generation in Iowa is not lind to the opportunities of ie farm.

Iowa Is Back on the Business Map

At a time when both private and public information about Iowa is mainly a matter of opinion, based on limited personal experience, it is helpful to check individual estimates of Iowa with this disinterested financial and economic survey, made by an eastern firm.

The map, printed above through the courtesy of the Brookmire Economic Service, New York, shows Iowa's position for summer and fall business in relation to the United States as a whole.

To the executive, the map has a broader significance than merely to point out the business opportunity in Iowa. It also shows a favorable outlook for the next six months over the major part of the country.

IOWA MERITS SALES EFFORTS, ACCORDING TO BUSINESS SURVEY

Sales and Credit Map Shows Favorable Market Condition

New York, June 25.—Iowa ranks among the four most favored sections in the United States for general business, according to the sales and credit map for summer and fall, issued recently by the Brookmire Economic Service.

The map is determined by a careful check of general trade indicators, including bank debits, business failures, collections, employment, wholesale trade, and collections. The map shows the entire state of Iowa as being one of the outstanding sections of the United States, on a general business rating.

1927 Income Above 1926

Estimated income for Iowa during the next six months, as shown by the income tables which accompany the map, is $864,000,000.00, nearly $400 per capita. This is a gain over the income for last year, and also over the average for the last three years. Iowa is one of the few sections in which a double gain has been registered.

Industrial Income Gains

One of the important factors in the growth of Iowa's income has been the industrial progress of the state. Total output of Iowa factories for 1926 was about $800,000,000.00, and 1927 production is reported ahead of 1926.

The gain in industrial production, nearly $300,000,000 above 1921 has not only increased the buying power of Iowa cities, but has helped to provide a better local market for Iowa farm products, which in turn has a favorable influence on income.

Income Evenly Distributed

The business situation in Iowa may be taken as even more favorable than is shown by the figures on per capita income, since compared with other states, the distribution of Iowa's income extends more evenly over the state and among its citizens.

It is even distribution of buying power, rather than concentration in certain areas or among certain classes, which makes the best potential market.

ADVERTISERS who understand the Iowa situation know from experience that the consumers' market there cannot be properly sold without the use of newspapers in these twenty-one key cities.

LOCAL TRADE REPORT INDICATES PROGRESS

Wholesalers and Retailers Show Consistent Increases

Marshalltown, June 25.—The economic progress of Iowa, as reported by the Sales and Credit Map, is reflected in a recent survey of local wholesalers and retailers.

Remarkable increases in business were not reported, but the cross-section showed a consistent gain over 1926. The following are typical comments:

Letts, Fletcher Company: Although we have reorganized our territory so that we are now covering it with a smaller number of salesmen than were required last year, our sales show an increase over the corresponding months of 1926.

J. C. Penny Company: Our business up to April 30 showed an increase of approximately 13 per cent over 1926. Excessive rains and unseasonable weather have prevented us from making a similar gain for May. We are confident that fall business will be up to or better than normal, and have made purchases on that basis.

The New England Company: Higher prices for agricultural products, and profitable employment of labor, have put our business well on the right side of the ledger. We are looking forward to a good fall trade.

PLAIN PEOPLE GIVE DAILIES THEIR POWER

tising of your strongest competitors in the advertising line.

The worst pest of all is the free publicity agent who argues with the big business concern that it is folly to pay for advertising space in the newspapers. He, the press agent, can secure free publicity by his influence with the publisher or with persons on the staff of the newspapers. His product comes sometimes brazenly and openly enough, sometimes hidden in so-called syndicate letters offered free. Sometimes they have the temerity to ask a low price for the syndicate letters. They are often insidious and ingenious. The press agent is always well paid for his work. The newspaper is the goat. The waste baskets up in the Times office are crammed with such literature every day. Yet with all our watchfulness at infrequent intervals something gets through. A good many publishers fall for it right along. Don't you see that so long as the press agent can put these things over on the papers, you will never get a line of paid advertising from the houses he represents? The publisher should put his foot down strong on such an outrageous imposition.

Frankly, I do not like the chain newspaper game. Its tendency is to take all the idealism and sentiment out of the newspapers, standardize them and convert them into money making machines.

Look at Hearst. Besides a dozen magazines and film news corporations, he has great newspapers, morning or evening or both, in New York, Boston, Washington, Baltimore, Atlanta, Chicago, Milwaukee, San Francisco, Los Angeles, Rochester, Syracuse and other towns. Like a great colossus he doth bestride the continent. But whatever you may think of Hearst and his influence for good or evil, he is a newspaperman, and one of the greatest of his generation. That is what cannot be said of most of the other millionaire owners of many newspapers.

Frank Munsey, having bought and done to death the New York News, the New York Press, the Philadelphia Evening Times and goodness knows how many other newspapers, was up to the time of his death suckling the New York Sun, which had a glorious past under Charles A. Dana. He had a short time before his death sold the Herald, which won world wide fame under that stormy petrel, James Gordon Bennett, to the Tribune. William Cullen Bryant's and Larry Godkin's Evening Post is now an attachment of C. H. K. Curtis. In Philadelphia the Public Ledger of George W. Childs, the Times of Alexander K. McClure, the Press, which Charles Emory Smith made great, the Wanamaker Evening Telegraph and Van Valkenberg's iconoclastic North American have all been swept into the capacious maw of Cyrus H. K. Curtis and merged with the Public Ledger; while another Philadelphia paper, the Record, controlled by Wanamaker, is in the market.

Marse Henry Watterson, type of a great generation of journalists, lived to see his fine paper the Louisville Courier-Journal taken over by the heir to Standard Oil Flagler's millions. Why did these great newspapers fall into the hands of multi-millionaires? Because they could not live on their legitimate business and went to wealthy men who could afford to nourish and expand them. When other business ventures prove unprofitable they are closed up by the sheriff. When a newspaper is ready for the grave somebody comes along and resuscitates it.

Now this passing of newspaper control out of the hands of trained newspapermen and into the hands of very wealthy men is a serious thing for the people. It places tremendous power for the molding of public opinion in the hands of a few strong men and there is danger that it will not always be exerted in the popular interest but rather in the interest of the owner and his associates for their own aggrandizement. There is danger that the press may get out of touch with the people. Moreover the power of illimitable control of money with the willingness to spend it like a drunken sailor makes very difficult competition for the publisher who has not the money bags to fall back upon. I fear that the newspaper business has fallen upon evil days and I sigh for the good old days when every great newspaper had at its head and in control some outstanding man who had earned his reputation in newspaper work.

The Scripps-Howard combination has a score of newspapers scattered all over the country, the outcome of the life work of E. W. Scripps. It conducts as a by-product a great news service organized for profit which has thus far devoted itself to the dissemination of news; but if it should fall into the hands of mercenary men it might become an agency of great evil. Frank Gannett, Paul Block, James M. Cox and a score of other individuals and combinations also have the string paper fever.

There is something in the combination of a morning and evening publication in the same plant owned and conducted by the same man or little group of men that appeals to me. It is running strong in the New England states and is spreading all over the country. We have such a combination in our own state where Henry Walser and J. W. Derschuck are running in combination in Hazleton. I was up in Worcester, Mass., about a year ago where Mr. Booth is conducting the Telegram-Gazette, the Gazette in the afternoon and the Telegram in the morning. No ads are accepted for one that don't go in the other. There is only one setting of type for the two papers. There is little or no change in the make-up. The machinery does double work. You will readily perceive the tremendous saving by such a combination.

Up in Springfield, Mass., the situation is even more surprising. The Bowles family have conducted the Springfield Republican, an independent paper of wonderful reputation for so small a town, for almost time out of mind. There were four daily newspapers and two Sundays published in Springfield. The representative of the Bowles family for this generation has purchased all four of the newspapers and the extra Sunday paper. He is publishing the daily papers in two morning and evening combinations and has killed one of the Sunday papers. Some of these newspapers are Republican, others are Democratic, and still others independent. Some of them are wets and others are dry. Some are high protectionists and others are for a tariff for revenue only to meet the expenses of government economically administered. Yet they are all going under the ownership of the same man and they are all apparently in prosperous condition. If you want publicity in the city of Springfield, you have to go to Mr. Bowles for it.

Here are a few of the subjects that it will be possible, perhaps profitable, for members of our editorial organizations to discuss.

BARS "CHARITY" ADVERTISING

Richmond Merchants to Increase Their Newspaper Space

The Richmond (Va.) Retail Merchants' Association, at its last meeting, decided to make a sharp reduction in the usual amount of booklet, program and souvenir publicity, and increase the amount of newspaper advertising used by members of the organization.

A committee, the members of which have not been divulged, to be known as the "secret" committee, was appointed to pass on the worthiness of organizations seeking donations and advertising from the association. The new rules will go into effect at once, it was said.

W. A. Clarke, Jr., secretary of the group, said: "The association has decided to suspend advertising on theatre tickets, door checks, rain checks, score cards, hotel registers, wall thermometers, athletic and theatrical programs and similar media, except when such advertising is recommended by a committee of the association. Advertising will be diverted to newspapers."

TWO IMPORTANT POINTS ARE GIVEN EMPHASIS

PROOF OF ECONOMY AND EFFICIENCY

One advertiser recently writes, "No mistake was made in selecting The Star to carry the copy in Washington for The Star's cost per inquiry in the prize recipe contest was the LOWEST OF ANY PAPER IN THE UNITED STATES—about HALF THE COST of the second best."

That The Star leads the field in every class of advertising—both local and foreign.

That The Star's total lineage was 585,461 lines MORE than that carried by the three other papers combined.

Any advertiser interested in cultivating this rich market should study these concrete figures bearing in mind that one appropriation—in The Star—is sufficient to completely and influentially command this field.

JULIUS HERMAN, ROTO PIONEER, DIES

Came to U. S. in 1888 and Became President of Printing Company—Aided in Producing First Roto Section in America

By Charles F. Hart
Mechanical Superintendent, New York Times

A recent cable from Europe announces the death of Julius Herman, president of the Rotoprint Gravure Company, New York, on May 27, at his native town, Vienna.

He was born at Vienna, Dec. 24, 1870, which would make his age at death, fifty-six. His education consisted of the ordinary grade school and the equal to our high school general training, until he reached the age of 18 years, when he came to the United States and obtained a clerical position with the Sackett & Wilhelms Printing and Machinery Company at Brooklyn, New York, until 1911, during which time he rose to Treasurer and later president, holding one or the other of these positions for a total period of 11 years.

In 1914, he organized, with John L. Zaugg as a partner, the Rotoprint Gravure Company, New York, becoming president thereof and holding this position during the growth of this company to date, although the corporate structure of the Rotoprint Company on Jan. 1, 1926, was merged with the Hall Printing Company of Chicago and New York, Mr. Herman however, retaining his title and position, together with extensive financial holdings, in the merger.

Mr. Herman became acquainted with the fundamentals of the rotogravure printing process in Germany in 1911 and studied and developed details of this method intensively and during the same year bought the process rights in behalf of the Sackett & Wilhelms Company and was the original pioneer to bring these results to and develop them in America. His company printed the New York Times' Christmas and New Year's editions in rotogravure which were the first of their kind in this country, at the end of 1913, the work being performed in the Sackett & Wilhelms Company's Brooklyn plant, shortly after which he sold and imported and installed their own rotogravure presses for the Times. Later, similar equipment was sold by and through Mr. Herman to the Chicago Tribune, the Curtis Publishing Company of Philadelphia, the Boston Herald, the Cleveland Leader, the Toronto Star, etc.

In addition to developing the rotogravure processes in this country for newspaper printing account, Mr. Herman obtained the first magazine insert rotogravure printing contract in the United States from the National Geographic Magazine, the latter holding exclusive publishing privileges in this particular direction for an initial period of six months.

He organized the Chicago Rotoprint Company and plant in Chicago in 1923, with the Hall Printing Company and his nephew, Alfred B. Geiger, and his partner, Mr. Zaugg, associated therein, this plant also having been merged in company with the New York organization into the Hall organization during 1926.

The rotogravure industry in this country owes Julius Herman a great deal. His work, during the early years of the World War, in lending every possible aid to the development of American rotogravure machinery and his sound and encouraging advice to competitors did much to establish rotogravure printing, particularly in New York City, on a sound financial basis.

His every thought was for the continued progress, not only of his own organization but the industry as a whole.

He built up a large business from this inauspicious start and 34 years ago combined forces with Percy Procter, a pioneer in the advertising field, forming the Procter-Collier Advertising Company, of which he was president and secretary at the time of his death. For years he was a director of the National Typothetæ. He was a member of the American Association of Advertising Agencies, Sons of the Revolution, Society of Colonial Wars, Queen City Club, Cincinnati Country Club, Chamber of Commerce and the Cincinnati Club. Dealer Co-Operation is real —

In the Keystone Market....

The experience of many National Advertisers in the Keystone Market has been both surprising and gratifying. In nearly every instance they have been able to tie up the local dealer with their campaigns. Because the dealer knows the value of the advertised product to bring customers to his store—he features the goods in this window. He displays them prominently on the show case and counter. He instructs his salespeople behind the counter to push it. He is sold on the quick sale, big volume and rapid turnover idea, behind the national product.

If you are not getting dealer co-operation from the Pennsylvania Market try a campaign of advertising in the papers listed below and watch your sales and dealer distribution grow.

U. S. PUBLICATIONS BARRED

Unable to Enter Mexico Because of "Derogatory Articles"

Seven newspapers and magazines published in the United States are at present barred from the Mexican mails under government censorship. These are the Saturday Evening Post, Liberty Magazine, the Washington Post and Los Angeles El Eco de Mexico, La Opinion, Los Angeles, El Continental, El Paso, and La Prensa, San Antonio. El Heraldo de Mexico, Los Angeles, Cal., was barred for a time, but the restriction has been removed and the paper is now allowed to enter the country.

Newspapers in Mexico City were subjected to censorship for a time, but are now being published without supervision by the government. However, government censors pass on all messages sent out either over the cable or the National Telegraph lines.

Action against the American papers and magazines was taken by the government on the charge that the publications had carried articles which were derogatory to the Mexican government and people. No specific mention was made as to what articles were considered offensive.

The offensive papers are confiscated by postal authorities at point of destination.

RADIO FANS DENOUNCE AIR ADVERTISING

Direct Broadcasting of Articles and Prices Offensive, Questionnaire Reveals—Good Will Programs Approved

(By Telegraph to EDITOR & PUBLISHER)

CINCINNATI, June 22.—Data compiled from a questionnaire sent out to more than 8,000 persons, including radio editors of newspapers, Chambers of Commerce, members of the U. S. Radio Society and listeners representative of the better type of intelligence sent to Washington this week by the U. S. Radio Society gave an interesting composite view of the listeners' position with regard to direct advertising on the air.

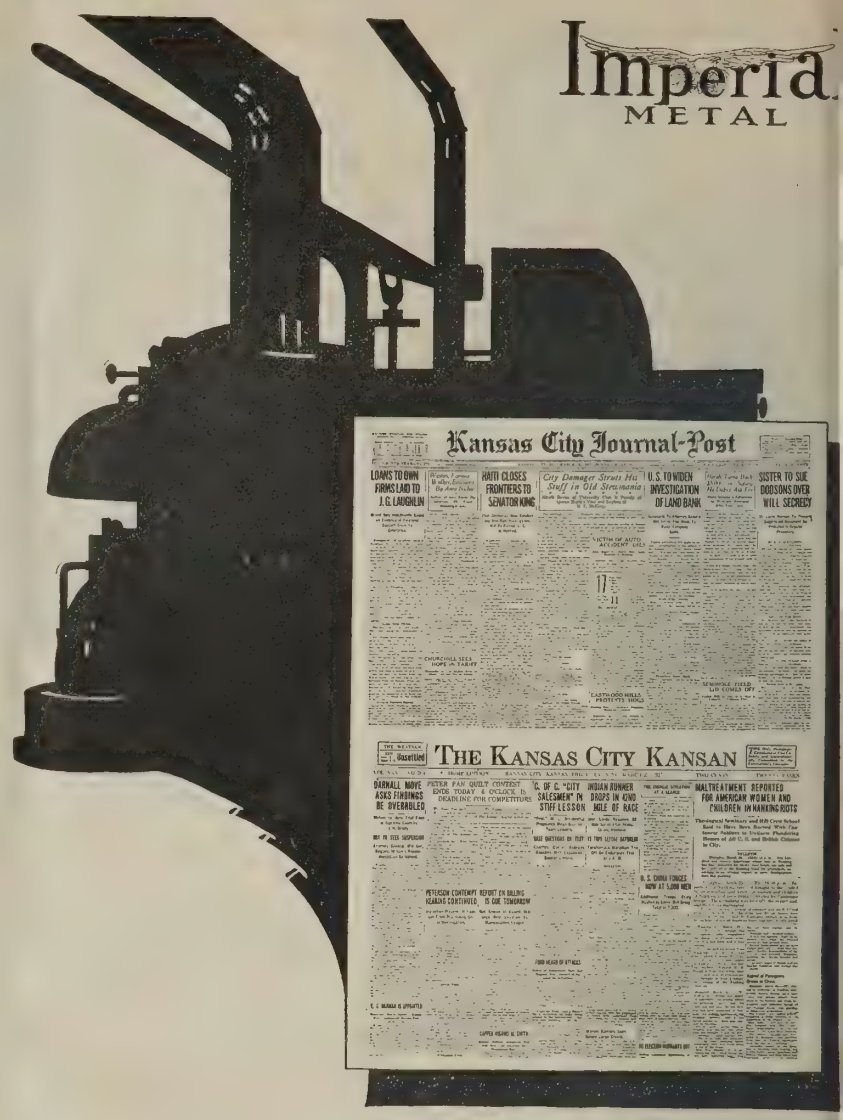
The statement of the results of the questionnaire was given out today by Paul A. Greene, managing director of the U. S. Radio Society, headquarters Cincinnati, following his forwarding of a copy to the Federal Radio Commission at Washington.

"Fully 92 per cent of the answers to the questionnaires were signed," said Mr. Greene, "and the interesting part of the opinions expressed was that practically every respondent voiced his objections to direct advertising, but said that he had no objection to good will advertising of radio stations or stations operated in connection with newspapers or manufacturers. There was no objection to the Ever-Ready Hour or other good will programs placed on the air. The opinion prevailed that the direct advertising should be confined to newspapers, magazines and billboards and had no place on the air from radio stations.

"There was universal complaint from a station at Shenandoah, Ia., where direct advertising was being carried to an almost nauseating degree by a firm which was attempting to sell auto tires, prunes, groceries of all kinds and giving prices from the station as well as directions for sending orders. Merchants and commercial bodies were joining in protests against this type of direct advertising, and rightly so, for such things have no place on a radio program. There was no objection made by listeners to stations using the name of the concern operating it for good will advertising purposes or stating the product advertised, be it tooth paste, playing cards, soaps, tires or what not, but only in connection with announcing programs.

"The respondents declared against the use of radio for propaganda purposes and thought that all speeches should be censored by the station directors before delivered and all propaganda eliminated."

"The Commission has no censorship programs," said Mr. Greene, in conclusion, "but the law so reads that stations which the commission finds are not performing a public service will not be given preference in fixing wave lengths or issuing licenses to operate. The Commission can hold that such and such stations are objectionable to the listeners and are not performing a public service. We hope that after reviewing the results of the questionnaires that the Commission may give heed to the expressions of the listeners, and we believe that they will be so guided on this question of direct advertising on the air.



"Our responses came from all parts of the United States and may be well termed a cross-section of opinion in this regard."

A. B. C. RULE ON RETURNS TO BE REPEALED

creasing circulation, and an epic eulogy of the yelling newsboy by Sidney D. Long, of the Wichita (Kan.) Eagle, featured the opening day of the convention.

Called to order by President Payne, Indianapolis Star, the more than 100 delegates attending heard the address of welcome from the local mayor, and the response by John Schmid, circulation director of the Hearst newspapers, before committee reports were submitted and consideration of circulation topics of the day really got under way. In epitome the net of the convention's opening day was a tug-of-war between two questions, "Should we increase, and how can we increase circulation?"

It was Mr. Park who sounded the warning note, urging the circulators to bear in mind that increased circulation may be a liability, rather than an asset.

"Circulation," he said, "should be no larger than necessary to cover the reading population within the trading district around the office of publication. A logical trading area that can be covered is one that can be reached on the day of publication.

"Sometimes an increase is demanded to live up to such a definition."

Speakers here this week generally approved legitimate editorial feature contests and were divided in their opinion as to the value of insurance policy schemes to increase the number of newspaper readers.

Loudly applauded was James Fletcher, Birmingham News, who, in the midst of this discussion, stood up and condemned all contests, premiums and circulation schemes as a "false stimulus," which, like drugs, left the addict weakened, shaken and forsaken.

"We circulation managers should devote more of our time to studying the contents of our paper in order that we may sell it on its news merits alone," he maintained.

Championing puzzle contests was H. Kloecher, of the Cincinnati Enquirer. He had run, he said, three puzzle contests, each one involving $4,550 in cash awards, and had obtained 14,197 paid in advance six months to one year's subscriptions. Of this total 10,614 were new and 3,585 renewals. The average cost was estimated at 71 cents per order.

Another advocate of the puzzle route was George McTaggart, of the Toronto Mail and Empire. He said that three puzzle pictures netted his paper 17,203 new subscriptions and 4,100 renewals for 12 months at an advance cost of little more than 40 per cent.

While he did not cite any particular contests he had used or furnish figures on the results obtained, John A. Mathews, of the St. Paul Dispatch, also supported the contest idea, provided, he said, they were "operated fairly and gave the readers information or entertainment."

There was no such harmony when insurance policy schemes were broached. The question on the program was "Is Insurance Here to Stay?" And the three speakers stood one in the affirmative, one on the fence, and one negative.

Asked for a show of hands among those in the convention hall, about 40 out of 100 said they were using the insurance policy scheme as a promotion stunt and of those using it 30 expressed the belief they would continue it.

The speaker endorsing the idea generally was John Eisenlord, of the Chicago Daily News. He said he thought the $1,000 policies did better sometimes than the higher offers. He estimated that between 70 and 80 per cent insurance-gained subscriptions were put on to stay.

Straddling the issue, Roy Hatton, of the Detroit Free Press, said that if insurance policies were used simply to get readers, and were not carefully handled by the newspaper, they had no value, while they would be of value for those "limited newspapers willing to spend money to make the policy offers of real service to the community."

"Out of two years' experience with insurance policies," he said, "I am willing to say they will endure as a builder and stabilizer of circulation, if properly presented. There is little to be gained in giving policies free. The value lies wholly in the development of a service which will win the appreciation of the readers."

C. S. Wilson, Columbus Dispatch, although he has used insurance policies for more than five years, declared in his opinion the scheme had no promotion value. When first inaugurated, and boosted by heavy office advertising, it works well, he maintained, but after a year or so it begins to wear down, the renewals become fewer and fewer while the expense becomes greater and greater.

The Dispatch, he explained, organized its own insurance company, depositing $100,000 with a local bank to meet claims, and depositing 75 cents out of every $1 paid by a subscriber for the policy to the same account. He said the newspaper's insurance company did not pay any profit. Every Wednesday his paper publishes claims paid. These claims average around 18 a week.

Mr. Hatton, who is a past president, received a rousing welcome when he appeared at the convention to speak. It had been reported he was ill and would be unable to attend. He admitted he was in Atlanta against his doctor's orders.

Delegates were plainly divided into two camps over the question of whether or not promotion through carrier organizations was becoming more effective or was losing its punch.

Only two of four scheduled papers on this topic were read. A paper written by Oliver King, of the Phoenix (Ariz.) Republican, was read by Clarence Eyster, Peoria Evening Star, and association president. It was in favor of carrier promotion and presented results of a questionnaire quoting unnamed circulation managers in all but one State as saying that the carrier boy was continuing to make good as a seller of subscriptions.

Kansas was the State the circulation managers of which said that carrier salesmanship was on the decline.

"I don't believe that boy salesmen can tell the merits of a paper with as much force as grown men," one circulation manager said.

W. J. Parker, of the Chicago American, whose paper was read for him, was not sure carrier promotion was good. "For one thing, it is a hard matter to keep boys on the job," he said. "Golf players lure them to the links where they can make much more money as caddies.

"Efforts to get home delivered circulation," he argued, "are too apt to take the dishpan route. People buy a subscription just to get a premium, or, worse still, just to help some little boy get a skooter bike. They don't have any idea of continuing the paper.

"We have our own independent carrier organization of 1,700 boys delivering 75,000 papers to homes, and I don't believe we would lose much home delivered circulation if we discontinue this costly system. In my opinion the real problem is to make a paper easy for people to buy. Have lots of stands, lots of boys, lots of selling points. People buy their papers and become their own carriers. Virtually all papers that come off the press are home delivered papers, whether the newspaper delivers them or the subscriber himself."

Of the routine reports the most interesting was that of the membership committee, headed by C. D. O'Rourke, of the Indianapolis Times. He said 67 new members had been obtained during th last year, and that the total membersh now stood at 643. W. C. Hixson, Syr cuse Post-Standard, of the railway ma and post office committee of the America Newspaper Publishers' Association, urge I. C. M. A. members to discuss post rates with their Congressmen.

A down-to-the-ground exposition o how to obtain mail subscriptions wa furnished delegates by E. P. Schwartz c the Des Moines Register and Tribune Capital, speaking extemporaneously o Wednesday morning. The Register ha 33,000 mail subscribers in 1921, h said, and now has 55,000. Mail subscrip tions of the evening paper, assisted b consolidations, had jumped from 7,000 t 43,000.

To obtain the Register's increase, ac cording to Mr. Schwartz, subscriptio salesmen were relied upon almost exclu sively. Forty-five men worked on care fully charted territory out of the mai office within a radius of 150 miles an were paid on a straight commission basis being allowed 50 per cent for new sub scriptions and 10 per cent for renewals By "new" was meant any subscriber of the paper's regular list 30 days or longer The salesmen had to pay all their ex penses, but were given an extra bonus commission of 10 per cent on every $5 worth of business.

Over a period of three years the morn ing paper, Schwartz said, had received a net income from each mail subscriber of $4.45 out of a possible $5, and for the evening $3.36 out of a possible $4. He explained this low cost of obtaining sub scriptions, despite the high commissions paid solicitors, as due to the fact that 55 per cent of the renewals came in from readers in response to "friendly letters suggesting renewal." During the last two years there had been 72 per cent re newals.

Answering a query from the floor, Schwartz said that in paying as high as 60 per cent commission to subscription salesmen his paper was not violating any A. B. C. ruling, since the total cost averaged under 50 per cent.

Schwartz also told of 11 motor routes operated by his paper out of Des Moines. They run from 40 miles to as high as 150. Route drivers were paid 5 cents a mile, plus the regular profit on the papers sold.

"I am opposed to any subscription bargain offers," Schwartz said, "on the theory that a year's steady sales effort is more effective than any 40 or 50-day cut-rate drive."

A different viewpoint on cut rates was held by W. C. Mercier, Fort Wayne Journal-Gazette. He said it was all very well to wear a high hat and talk ethics when you were sitting on top of the world, but "after all, the world is round, and you'd better watch out or you'll slip off."

"I will probably be considered a black sheep in this gathering," Mercier declared, "because I increased mail subscriptions over the last five years 100 per cent by making cut rates. I thought it good business, because I found I could get a subscription for $1 per order by cutting the rate, and it cost me $1.62 by solicitors. That 62 cents per order, in my opinion, is worth saving the publisher."

Mercier reached his cost of $1.62 per order on subscriptions obtained by solicitors on a recent drive when six solicitors working 40 days, with the help of a magazine clubbing offer, put on 108 new subscriptions and 169 renewals. This brought in a revenue of $1,336.50, minus a total expense of 459.43, making the total cost per order $1.62.

In a paper read by the secretary, W. T. Corbin, Greensboro (N. C.) News, described two methods his paper used obtaining mail subscribers, mail sampling, using the boxholder privileges afforded by the post office, and personal solicitation.

Following this paper, M. H. Brandon, Charlotte (N. C.) Observer, rose to suggest that the I. C. M. A. strive to get the postal authorities to change the ruling extending the present three-day boxholder sampling privilege to 10 or 30 days. The three days, in his opinion, were not suffi-

CIRCULATION CHATTER F. O. B. ATLANTA

I. C. M. A. opened its convention Monday evening with a closed session of the board of directors. Those attending were President Payne, Harold Hough, Fort Worth Star-Telegram; J. M. Annenberg, Curtis-Martin Newspapers; Clarence Eyster, Peoria Evening Star and secretary-treasurer of the association; Thomas J. Dowling, Scripps-Howard Newspapers; John Toler, Atlanta Constitution; Wiley B. Baker, Knoxville Sentinel; J. N. Eisenlord, Chicago Daily News; James Mathews, St. Paul Pioneer Press; Wills A. Butler, Denver Rocky Mountain News and Evening News; Royal Weiler, Allentown Morning Call; Vattier Snyder, Pittsburgh Chronicle Telegraph; and H. W. Stodgill, Louisville Courier-Journal and Times.

PITTSBURGH will be the next meeting place for the circulators. That seemed inevitable when the convention started. J. H. Miller, Jr., Pittsburgh Gazette Times and Vattier Snyder, Pittsburgh Chronicle Telegraph, brought letters with them from publishers of the newspapers in their city, urging the circulation men to come there in 1928.

A PARTY motoring to the convention from New Orleans included J. L. Thornton, New Orleans Item-Tribune; J. O. Stuardi, Mobile Register; Oscar Anderson, Montgomery Journal; and A. E. MacKinnon of New York, who happened to be in New Orleans on business.

OVER the bounding deep came a gay crowd from New York. With James McKernan as leader, others on the S.S. City of Birmingham, which left New York last Friday arriving in Savannah Monday were:

J. N. Annenberg, Curtis-Martin Newspapers, and Mrs. Annenberg; A. B. Croshere, New Bedford (Mass.) Standard; T. J. Dowling, Scripps-Howard Newspapers; Louis Hammond, Boston Transcript and Mrs. Hammond; Miss Hilda Larsen, Tarentum (Pa.) Valley Daily News; Seth Moore, Brooklyn Eagle and Mrs. Moore; Abram Newman, New York Evening Post; George H. Reynolds, president Magnetic Player Board Company; S. H. Engelberg, and Miss Engelberg, Ragle Pencil Company, New York; and W. G. Ryan, Addressograph Company, New York.

OSCAR ANDERSON, of the Montgomery Journal, who, in point of weight is sometimes referred to as the biggest man in the I. C. M. A., had a story of fast building to tell friends at the Atlanta Biltmore.

The Journal, he said, will have a new two-story plant completed shortly, the building of which, will have required only about 40 days, a record for the South. The new home of the Journal will measure roughly 80 by 80 feet, according to Anderson.

He said that the construction company that landed the contract for the building had to agree to complete its work within 50 days or pay a forfeit for each day over that period. They were also to receive a bonus for ever day under the time, and, in consequence, are pushing the work in magical fashion.

The new Journal home is on the site of the old building, which was torn down in two weeks. F. I. Thompson, owner of the Journal, bought the Montgomery Times last April, and the purchase price included a six month's lease of the plant and press equipment. It is this plant that is being used now while the record-smashing construction work is underway.

HAVING both men carriers and boys, W. T. MacKendree, circulation manager of the Augusta (Ga.) Herald, prefers the latter, he said this week at the convention.

"A boy 17 years old does the best carrier work for a newspaper, I believe, Mr. MacKendree said. "Our biggest route of 155 papers is carried by a boy this age. We have 107 city carriers, all boys, and men carriers in the surrounding towns."

The Herald, according to its circulation manager, controls all the money in the operation of its carrier system. The boys turn it all in as it is collected, and the paper pays them 33⅓ per cent of the total, keeping the remainder for itself. Thus out of an 18 cent a week price for the paper to reader, the carrier boy gets 6.

ent to interests prospects in the value of paper.

Out of this convention it seems a movement will be started to get baseball fans to urge the managers to start games earlier. It was argued by Walter Rauck, Cincinnati Post, and Karl F. Hall, Toledo Blade, that this would be a great help the newspapers covering the sport. They thought the fans would be unanimous in favoring beginning ball games at 2:30 instead of 3 P. M.

This was one feature of Wednesday afternoon's session, which contributed interesting statistics on costs of motor truck operation and some laughable reports on the trials and tribulations of using the reindeer plan.

George Galloway, Rockford (Ill.) Register-Gazette, through a questionnaire, learned that 97 newspapers are now operating 691 motor routes 60,000 miles today.

J. C. Montgomery, Detroit News, reported that he had found the average cost of operating trucks over a 12 months' period was 26½ cents per cwt. This cost included all except garage overhead. EDITOR & PUBLISHER will report these interesting papers in full next week.

Useful statistics were also gathered by questionnaire by C. D. O'Rourke, Indianapolis Times, on the division of the average net earnings of a circulation department.

Delegates rocked with laughter as speakers told of exciting adventures they had in curbing wild reindeer brought down from the frozen north to build circulation for American newspapers. They agreed that the reindeer plan did not increase circulation but said it did build good will for a newspaper.

Lewis Hoffman, St. Louis Star, commented particularly on the expense of the plan. He also did some letter writing to learn the opinions of others who had acquired reindeer. One of his questions was: Will you repeat in 1927? Out of 11, two answered yes, three no, and six doubtful. Seth Moore, Brooklyn Eagle, was one of those answering yes, although he admitted to having had some thrilling experiences as a reindeer cowboy.

Other speakers Wednesday were Charles S. Chaffee, Aurora Beacon-News and Ralph Seeman, St. Louis Globe-Democrat. Seeman argued that circulation rates were too low, that overhead was increasing and that it was time to make the circulation department an earning department exclusive of the cost of white paper. He said abolishment of the full return privilege would cut down circulation expense, and advocated action in that direction. Chaffee reported he had calculated that if he added $2 a year to his present charge of $5 a year for subscriptions it would take care of all circulation department expenses except white paper.

EIGHT BOSTON STORES PLAN SHOPPING NEWS

Company Incorporated at $100,000 Will Start Publication in Fall —Patterned After Cleveland Paper

Eight of the largest Boston department stores will in the autumn sponsor The Boston Shopping News, a paper devoted entirely to advertising and patterned exactly after the Cleveland Shopping News and similar advertising papers published in Los Angeles and Detroit.

A corporation has been formed by seven prominent Hub business men and has a capital of $100,000 with each incorporator taking 40 shares. According to the incorporation papers the purpose is the "gathering and distribution of advertising material of every sort, to acquire, print, publish, conduct, circulate and distribute, sell or otherwise deal in advertising matter, including papers and periodicals.

The incorporators are George W. Mitton, president of Jordan Marsh Company; George B. Johnson, president of the R. H. White Company; Felix Vorenberg president of the F. Vorenberg Company, and vice-president and secretary of Gilchrist Company; Erving P. More, president of Houghton Dutton Company; John Shepard, 3d, president of the Shepard Stores; Adolph Ehrlich, president of C. F. Hovey Company; and Frank A. Black, publicity manager of Wiliam Filene's Sons Company.

The new paper will be conducted in accordance with the aims of the Boston Better Business Bureau and will contain advertisements of the incorporators and of such other Greater Boston firms as meet with their approval.

The Cleveland Shopping News, which will be used as a pattern, was started six years ago with a circulation of 100,000 and distributed free of charge once a week by school boys going from house to house.

DAILY 'KIDS' FREE PUFFS FOR ITS READERS

Unusual Column in Utica Observer-Dispatch Lists "Red Hot" News Items Received in Day's Mail

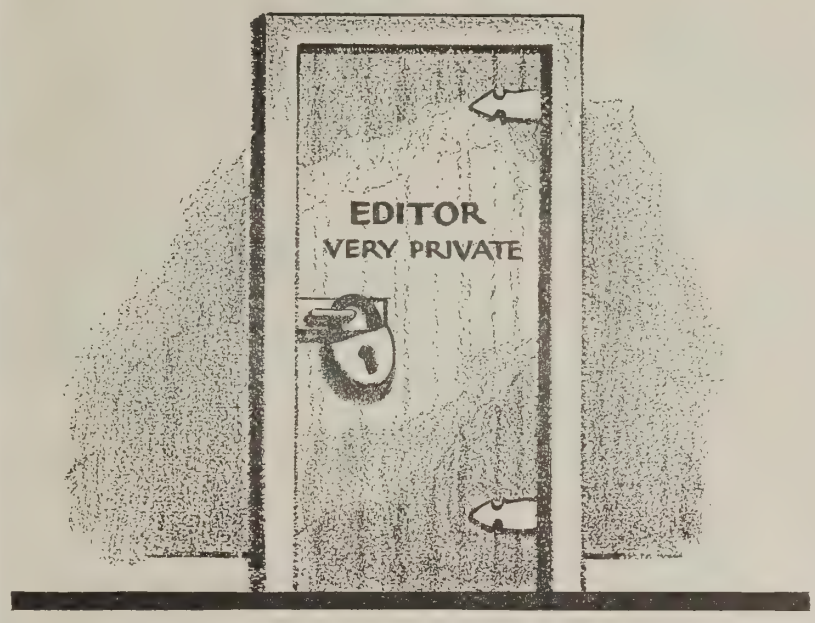
The campaign against puffery in the news columns is being carried vigorously, somewhat facetiously, to the editorial pages of up-state New York newspapers. A unique column in the Utica (N. Y.) Observer-Dispatch recently is being widely reprinted as a feature of the campaign.

The column, with a heading—"Daily Publicity Mail on the Editor's Desk"—sets forth in two or three lines practically all the worthwhile information contained in the reams of publicity received. The effect is ridicule of the corporations that are spending huge sums annually for puff artists.

Excerpts from a typical column in the Observer-Dispatch follows:

"Let's look over the editor's shoulder while he goes over one mail—not a day's mail, but just a single batch from the post office.

"University Travel Association, Inc., would tell the world in 600 words that 'girls are to have floating universities all their own.'



"National Better Business Bureau says in 400 words that Frank Hoffman is wanted in Saginaw.

"First National Productions furnishes a budget of 1,000 words or more informing the palpitating public that Mulhall is to be Colleen's lead, and a lot else.

"Some 600 words or more of editorials from the Republican state committee would save wear and tear on the editorial brain, if any, if used.

"Remember that The O-D is free to use all this matter without money and without price. But since the news editors who have prepared it no doubt were paid, and it took good paper, ink and postage to send it out, there must be a reason."

A MESSAGE . . to Managing Editors

How many of your readers have you ever met?

WITH changing social conditions, managing editors are flinging straws into the wind to see how reader tastes are blowing. A conception of what people want, formed even a few years ago, is off the target today.

If every managing editor could study his readers at close hand regularly, there is no question about his being able to give them exactly the kind of a newspaper they want.

Loss in circulation very often means a weakening of the editorial grip. It is expensive, tedious, even hazardous to experiment in the newspaper itself in the hope of striking the key to popular acceptance.

A fresh view-point given through Knight Certified interviews has helped to reconstruct many editorial policies.

There is only one place to go for a knowledge of what the people want—and that is to the people!

Editorial and advertising problems have been studied successfully by Emerson B. Knight, Inc., in such markets as:

A. N. A. NAMES PROFESSOR TO ANALYZE ADVERTISING RATE TRENDS

Study Will Be Made by Prof. Thompson of Texas, Who Will Work on Important Phases This Summer—Olds a New Director

ADVERTISING rates will be subjected to analysis this summer under the direction of the Association of National Advertisers. This research plan is the outcome of co-operation with the National Association of Teachers of Marketing and Advertising, through the latter's Committee on Research. The object is to provide first hand advertising studies for class room use and, at the same time, material of value to members of the Association of National Advertisers.

It was recently announced by Bernard Lichtenberg, of the Alexander Hamilton Institute, chairman of the Association's Committee on Co-operation with University Professors, that an appropriation of a sum not to exceed $1,000 has been made for salary and traveling expense of an appointee of the National Association of Teachers of Marketing and Advertising, who, during July and August, should spend his time working up material on a special phase of advertising rates.

To this fellowship has been appointed Paul J. Thompson, Associate Professor of Business Administration of the University of Texas.

According to Prof. George Burton Hotchkiss, of New York University, and of the Committee on Research, the study will have to be limited somewhat, perhaps to a study of the trend in advertising rates in periodicals—dailies, weeklies and monthly magazines. Such factors as the difference between local and foreign rates in newspapers, the question of quality in magazines, whether measured by the price of the publication or by the selectiveness of its circulation, may be dealt with incidentally.

The resignation of P. B. Zimmerman as a director was accepted by the board of directors at its last meeting, Mr. Zimmerman being ineligible to that office because no longer A. N. A. representative of the General Electric Company, though still connected with it.

Norman E. Olds, advertising manager of the Perfection Stove Company, was elected director to serve out the unexpired term of Mr. Zimmerman until Nov., 1928.

BIG NEWS EXPECTED AT POLITICS INSTITUTE

Newspapers Preparing to Cover Important International Gathering at Wiliamstown, Mass., Opening July 28

Viewing with special significance the coming of Count Carlos Sforza of Italy, editors of various newspapers and especially those in several metropolitan cities are beginning to select their correspondents to cover the seventh session of the Institute of Politics which opens at Williamstown on July 28.

Dr. Garfield, founder and chairman of the Institute, has already received several requests for the accommodation of correspondents. Indications are that a much larger number of newspaper men will attend the various round tables and conferences than at any time since the Institute was started.

The presence of Count Sforza is believed to mean that arguments on Fascism will rocket far above anything else expounded from the lecture platforms, and shoot along the wires to furnish some real copy.

This does not mean there will be a dearth of other important discussions and conferences. The program as arranged by Dr. Garfield is generally considered one of the best that has ever been built up.

The Institute will make a special study of the international problems now confronting the world, including the situations in China, Mexico and South America, the question of international debts, and the struggle for supremacy in Europe of the political ideals of democracy and dictatorship.

Statesmen and publicists from England, France, Italy, Germany Switzerland, Jugo-Slavia and Denmark will lecture and an entirely new group of American experts in international affairs has been obtained to lead round-table and general conference discussions.

A new ruling has been made this year by the Institute regarding the attendance at the various round-tables by representatives of the press. Heretofore it has been customary for many of the visitors to obtain press credentials from the Institute regardless of whether they were actually employed by a newspaper. This year only accredited representatives of the press will be accorded such privileges by the Publicity Bureau of the Institute.

While Count Sforza has been much in the press owing to his anti-Fascist attitude a slight discussion of his past activities might not be amiss.

Count Sforza was minister of Foreign Affairs for Italy during the Giolitti administration in 1920. In 1922 he was ambassador of Italy in Paris.

He defines his position as neither pro nor anti Mussolini. He was at various times the object of hostile demonstrations by Fascists.

Dr. Peter Reinhold, former Saxon Minister of Finance, and later Finance Minister in Chancellor Luther's cabinet in Germany, will lecture on the financial and economic policy of Germany.

Bishop Nicholai, of Ochrida, Macedonia, will deliver a series of lectures on the "New Spiritual Values in the Near East."

Robert Michels, Professor of Economics at the University of Basle, Switzerland, will address the Institute on some of the aspects of "Dictatorship versus Democracy in Europe," the subject of the round-table and general conference which Professor Henry R. Spencer, of Ohio State University will lead.

Other distinguished Europeans will deliver lectures at the Institute, including Dr. Jacob Lange, of Denmark, Professor John A. Todd of the Liverpool Cotton Service, England, and Dr. Pierre Le Paulle, of the French Bar, Paris.

HART ON A. B. C. BOARD

William A. Hart, director of advertising of the E. I. du Pont de Nemours Company, Wilmington, Del., has been elected to membership on the board of the Audit Bureau of Circulations.

best of plans may give anything but truth if the attitude of those working them is not right.

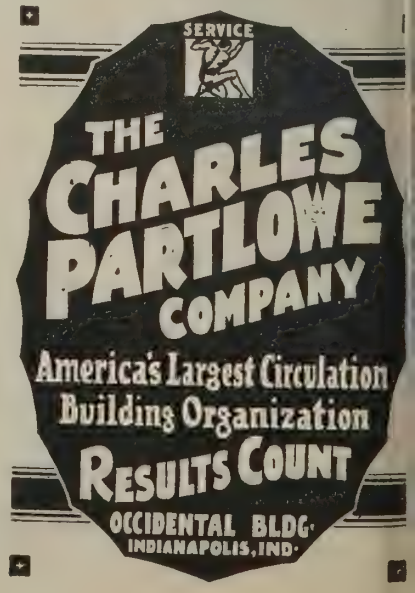
Perhaps you might be interested in an outsiders' conception of your job and how it interlocks as an important factor in the general scheme of the advertising business. When we consider the newspaper as a commodity, you are at the head of the sales department; but when we look at the publication as an advertising medium, you are no longer the sales manager, but the production manager. You produce the product and turn it over to the advertising department to sell. Circulation is that product.

You as the production department are relied upon by the advertising department to give them the amount and kind of circulation which that department is supposed to be selling. Hence, all that we have been dwelling upon concerns not only the publisher, as the representative of the whole organization, but the circulation manager in particular. It is with you that the integrity of the whole organism begins. If you frankly set forth just what you have produced to the minutest essential detail, you have given all that is possible to the success of the sales program and you may well take pride in your work.

Now just a word in closing as to the relationship between the Audit Bureau and yourselves. I have been told that the men in your departments sometimes look upon the A. B. C. auditors as enemies who are to be circumvented or at least not helped; that they often resent questions put to them as impertinent or as implying that the auditors do not think your employes truthful.

You can do a great service to this movement, which is so important to both the publisher and the advertiser, if you will take considerable pains to give y men a more sane and helpful point view.

The Bureau's auditors do not c into your offices as enemies, but friends. They are no more foes than auditors who regularly go through y company's financial records. If sometimes ask some corroboration statement, it is not because they do believe the statement, but because are expected to know of their knowledge the thing to which they tify.



They would be censurable and worthy of the name of auditor if took the word of President Cooli himself, if Mr. Coolidge had hired to audit the White House accounts. have invited our auditors to come in audit. An audit does not consist in ing the audited concern some questi and then accepting the answers. You business men understand this perfec but the boys and girls of your dep ment do not. Explain it to them. A. B. C. auditors are just as much employes of the publisher members the Audit Bureau as of the adverti members.

SEES A BILLION DOLLAR YEAR FOR NEWSPAPERS

New Record for Advertising and Circulation Income to Be Set This Year Beazell Tells Pennsylvania Publishers

Newspapers in 1927 will reach their first billion dollar year in revenue from advertising and circulation, W. P. Beazell, assistant managing editor of the New York World, told members of the Pennsylvania Newspaper Publishers Association at their summer meeting in Waynesboro last week. He based his prophecy on figures for 1926 and advertising volume during the first six months of this year.

"For 1925 the Department of Commerce figures showed a gross income of more than $890,000,000 for the newspapers of the United States," Mr. Beazell said. "I am not speaking of the printing and publishing industry as a whole. I am speaking of the newspapers alone—a segregation by the way, that is, for some reason, not often made. The $890,000,000 was made up of $230,000,000 from sales and $660,000,000 from advertising. The whole income was 11 per cent greater than in 1923, while advertising revenue was 14 per cent greater, and revenue from sales a little less than 4 per cent greater.

"Figures for last year are not yet a matter of official record, but close approximations of them are possible. Income from sales grew to $250,000,000, while advertising fairly soared to $740,000,000. This year the evidence is that income from sales will increase to $260,000,000, and advertising, despite the check it has suffered this spring, to $750,000,000. The gross, then, should rise $20,000,000 to $1,010,000,000.

"One other detail of the situation is interesting. Each dollar of newspaper income will represent 74 cents from advertising and 26 cents from sales. The ratio would seem to have been pegged at that point, after 12 years of steady increase on the part of advertising. In 1924 the newspaper dollar was made up of 58 advertising cents and 42 sales cents. Until 1925 the advertising curve was evenly upward. For the past two years it has stood at 74:26. Oddly enough this average for the country at large is higher than in the great cities, of which we sometimes think of as the golcondas of advertising. The metropolitan ratio is, and for some time has been, 70:30.

"I hope I do not sound as if I were exulting in these figures because they represent prodigious sums of money. Quite seriously, I have used these figures only because they afford a simple and accurate measurement of the very extraordinary growth we have been enjoying. I take pride in that growth, without for a moment weakening in my conviction that the first duty of a newspaper is to purvey news, or in my belief that it is not advertising but news that begets advertising."

Mr. Beazell then discussed the modern communication miracles as they relate to the press—radio-telephone, radio pictures, and telephoto.

"Wizardry gets out the modern newspaper," he concluded. "And yet I am not entirely sure that we are making the worthiest use of these magical devices and the opportunities they open up to us.

"We need more selectivity in the assembling of our news. We need more thorough reporting, and more good writing; I do not mean 'fine' writing—God forbid! We need to be more chary of superlatives in statement and in presentation.

"We need better editing. We have all too many good-enough newspapers and far too few really good ones.

"We need a new realization of the fact that justice to all with whom we deal in our news columns is a supreme obligation upon us. Above all we need a new sensitiveness to good taste."

INVITATIONS ISSUED FOR GENEVA MEET OF PRESS EXPERTS AUG. 24

International Meeting Under Auspices of League of Nations to Consider Press Rates, Censorship, Communications, and Facilities for Journalists

By ALBIN E. JOHNSON
Geneva Correspondent, EDITOR & PUBLISHER

GENEVA, June 11.—Preparations for the Conference of Press Experts, as the International Press Congress to be held in Geneva under the auspices of the League of Nations, on August 24, is known, have at last been completed, and invitations have been sent out to governments, press associations, journalists' organizations and newspapers.

The provisional agenda as drafted by the preparatory committees during the past year is as follows:

1. Press Rates:
   (a) Telegraph.
   (b) Telephone.
   (c) Wireless telegraph.
   (d) Wireless telephone.
2. Coding of Press Messages.
3. Improvement of Communications.
4. Transport of newspapers.
5. Postal subscriptions to newspapers.
6. Protection of News.
7. Professional facilities for Journalists.
   (a) Travel tours.
   (b) Schools for Journalists.
   (c) Scholarships for Journalists.
   (d) Double taxation of Journalists living abroad.
   (e) Reductions of steamship and railway fares.
   (f) Passport visas for Journalists.
   (g) Identity cards for Journalists.
   (h) Repressive measures against Foreign Journalists (expulsion).
   (i) Equality of treatment for Foreign Journalists.
   (j) Facility for enquiry afforded Journalists.
8. Censorship in Peace-time.
9. Information on the latest technical improvements of interest to the Press.
   (Wireless telephony, television, etc.)

The calling of the Conference signals a great success for the League, in that the original proposal of M. Yanez, Chilean delegate to the 1925 Assembly was confronted with many difficulties.

M. Yanez proposed: That the League Council consider the desirability of summoning a committee of Press Experts, representing the Press in different countries in order: (1) to enquire into the means of ensuring more rapid and less costly transmission of Press news with a view to reducing the risks of international misunderstanding. (2) to discuss all technical problems the solution of which in the opinion of experts, would be conducive to the tranquilization of public opinion in various countries.

It was due to the initiative and energy of M. Hymans, formerly foreign minister of Belgium, and member of the League Council that the plan materialized. When M. Hymans was succeeded by M. Vandervelde, present foreign minister of Belgium, the latter pressed the venture with equal sagacity and enthusiasm.

"The Chilean proposal is undoubtedly a bold one," declared M. Hymans in discussing it at the time. "The press, like all great powers, is rightly jealous of its independence. We must therefore approach the vast and delicate problem raised by this resolution with great circumspection. I wish to make it clear at the outset that the League does not wish to interfere in the affairs of the press and that it will only interest itself in them if the journalists themselves consider that its assistance is of value."

That was the spirit in which the League approached the undertaking. And in that spirit journalists, publishers and press association officials from a score of countries aided in the preparations. Among the Americans participating in the preliminary work were Roy W. Howard, of the Scripps-Howard Newspapers; Ed L. Keen, European manager and Henry Wood, Geneva correspondent of the United Press; Elmer Roberts, European manager and Joseph Sharkey, Geneva correspondent of the Associated Press; the Anglo-American Journalists Association, of which Wilbur Forrest, of the New York Herald Tribune, was president at the time. Lord Burnham and other prominent British publishers have taken an active interest also.

In adopting the Hyman's Report and authorizing the calling of the Conference, the last Assembly also clearly defined the part the League was to play. It noted:

"In certain cases the League of Nations can undoubtedly do a great deal to assist co-operation between the Governments and the press. Although an aggregate of private enterprises, the press is frequently obliged to have recourse to various government services. For example, it depends in a large measure, on the governments for the transmission of news by telegraph, telephone, cable and radio-telegraph; it also depends in every country upon the national legislation in all questions connected with authors' rights, transport rates, etc. In directions like these the friendly assistance of the League of Nations might often be of great value."

An indication of how complete has been the preparation can be gained from the fact that representatives of sixteen of the largest press agencies attended the first session. This was followed by a meeting in Geneva of representatives of sixteen European press bureaus, from as many countries, while lastly the various Journalists Associations gathered here to formulate the claims of the profession.

For the program of the conference all that was necessary was to draw up an agenda based upon the results of the preparatory work.

Among the requests that will be made, if the conference follows the lead of the Preparatory Committee are:

Priority of press telegrams over ordinary messages; reduction of rates by all governments for press communications by telegraph, telephone and wireless or cable.

Establishment of international conversations with a reduction of fifty per cent in current rates, with priority for press communications over ordinary private conversations; reduction of fifty per cent on urgent rates, with priority for urgent press communications over urgent private communications.

In regard to coding the Conference will recommend:

"That the accredited representatives of the press be allowed to use an appropriate code, in whole or in part, at ordinary press rates, for the sending of press news by wireless on the understanding that the code be communicated in advance to the telegraph companies . . . . . that unauthorized persons be prevented from utilizing wireless for press news."

The proposals for the "protection of news" have not yet been definitely formulated but the League Secretariat is preparing a memorandum on this subject.

The journalists, especially those engaging in international assignments have asked several advantages, chiefly of a nature to facilitate their work. They urge exemption from double taxation, freedom of transit from one country to another without the vexatious delays of passport and visa and customs formalities; an internationally recognized document of identity which will be accepted by postal and telegraph administrations of the International Postal Union; and the least possible censorship restrictions in times of peace.

That the Conference will confine itself to the agenda is not probable. Many interesting suggestions have been made by various publishers, journalists, and press organizations, and "regional" agreements between bordering countries or groups of countries, will undoubtedly be formulated at Geneva, with the object in view of fostering international relations.

The Roumanian delegation has suggested a scheme whereby scholarships be extended by various countries to journalists of other countries in order that they may become personally acquainted with conditions. It is not improbable, that in the future every telegraph and cable editor on every large international newspaper, will have as a preliminary course of training, a personal acquaintance with the countries wherein news which he edits, originates.

Other suggestions will aim at safeguarding the integrity of the press and the profession. Only journalists with the most unqualified credentials will be entitled to the exceptional advantages sought from governments. Publicity-mongers, "moochers" and others who come to Europe with a "letter of introduction" from the publisher of the Monthly Star of Blankville, seeking "reserved seats" in press galleries already overcrowded with working journalists will receive short shrift.

exas Press, Assembled at El Paso, Elects Neu, Paralyzed on Way to Meeting—Congressman Defines Free Press

Texarkana was chosen over Wichita alls and McAllen for the 1928 convenon of the Texas Press Association, hich on June 18 concluded its three days' ssions at El Paso, after electing ofcers. The association on its first day ad changed the order of business to elect s president George Neu, publisher Brenam Banner-Press, who, en route to the 3th annual convention, was stricken with aralysis and had to be taken to a hosital at Sweetwater. He succeeds R. L. aldridge, Clifton.

Other officers, some re-elected, were amed as follows: Vice-president, E. A. arlock, Paducah; secretary, Sam P. arben, Richardson; treasurer, Ben Harisl, La Grange; attorney, Clarence E. ilmore, Austin; historian, E. G. Senter, allas; essayist, H. D. Wells, Willingon; orator, R. H. McCarthy, Albany, nd poet, Mrs. Lee J. Roundtree, Bryan.

Adjudged the best all-round weekly in exas, the Whitewright Sun, published by . H. Waggoner, won the silver loving up offered by the Dallas News and Journal. Kerrville Mountain won prizes ofered for the best set advertisements, both uarter-page or larger and less than uarter-page. Rockdale Reporter was warded first honors for its job printing xhibit.

Among resolutions was one endorsing rompt state investigation of alleged lawssness in Hutchinson County. It was at orger, in that county, where a state anger and police officer arrested a Borer Herald reporter, allegedly because of bjections of criticisms of the officials, and he ranger attempted to censor dispatches elling of the reporter's arrest. Gov. Dan Moody discharged the ranger.

H. D. Slater, editor and publisher of the l Paso Times and Herald, welcomed the ewspaper visitors to El Paso. The reponse was by J. H. Lowry, Honey rove Signal.

Speaking on "Free Government and ree Press," Congressman Tom Connally f Marlin declared: "A press of indeendence, a press whose business office oes not overawe its editorial rooms, a ress whose columns carry the truth, a ress of high courage and patriotism, is ne of the richest possessions of a free eople."

"As the power of the press is increased, o are its responsibilities and duties reater," declared Connally.

"In recent years the special and syndiated writer has become an important facor. By reporting purported fact and rtfully intermingling comment and opinon of his own into the fabric of the rticle, it subtly and ingeniously colors the ind of the reader. These are the methds of the political propagandist. The ress, no doubt, is persistently beset by ose who would use its columns for propganda. And therein the newspaper has a reat responsibility. It is its duty to print ne truth. There is, however, great difculty in that regard. The quest of truth not always an easy task. The highest orm of service that can be rendered to ne public by any instrumentality is to arn the truth and then give the truth other men. That is the lofty mission the press."

Crediting the press with destruction of ecrecy in government, whereby wrongs nd abuses sought to hide themselves, ne Congressman declared a free press to e essential to a free government.

Among interesting "shop talks" was ne in which J. Claude Wells, Memphis emocrat, discussed "Undeveloped Adertising Resources." Among others ho should advertise are doctors and rmers, he insisted. Speaking of the rmer, he asked: "Why does the quack et the business? It is because he adertises," Wells answered his own queson. "If a doctor cannot do this ethicly, then he should let his fraternity do ."

Declaring physicians owe it to the public to advertise their ability to cure the ills of humanity, the speaker continued: "The medical profession has kept a cloak of darkness around its activities from its very inception. It is time for doctors to let the people know what they can do for them."

As to the farmer, Wells said: "Instead of spending two bits to advertise he has some hay to sell, he should take space of the right size and tell what kind of hay he has for sale. The buyer should be brought to the farmer."

To combat competition of the world and the devil, Wells advocated churches taking plenty of space to advertise their services in such a way that people will want to attend. "The little notice no longer has the appeal," he said. "Places of amusement advertise and draw the crowds. Why shouldn't churches do the same?"

Convention visitors were entertained in Juarez, Mexico, across the Rio Grande from El Paso, as well as in the Texas city. The Rio Grande is an unusual river in that it has one dry bank and one wet one!

A party of nearly 200 convention visitors en route on a special train to El Paso were entertained when they stopped at Mineral Wells, where a luncheon was tendered by the Chamber of Commerce. Sam E. Miller, editor Mineral Wells Index, was toastmaster, and C. W. Wilson, Index business manager, was one of the speakers. These included J. J. Taylor, "State Press" of the Dallas News, and several others.

R. H. Nichols nosed out Ralph Shuffler in the press golf tournament to win the Southwestern Paper Co. cup.

The editors were loud in their praise of W. A. Salter, who attended the convention, and his brother, C. E. Salter, coowner with W. A. of the Kerrville Mountain Sun, for their action in building and equipping a summer vacation camp, in the hills 17 miles from Kerrville, for free use of Texas newspaper folk and their families.

CIGARETTE AD LAW CASE ARGUED

Attorneys for Kansas Press Declare Advertising of an Article Whose Sale Is Legal Cannot Be Prohibited

Insisting that advertising of an article whose sale is legal cannot be forbidden. Charles B. Griffith, former attorney general of Kansas, as attorney for a group of editors representing the Kansas Press Association, recently brought before the State Supreme Court arguments against the validity of the new Kansas cigarette law.

The attorney general's office had previously upheld the legislature's attempt to retain the old restriction against advertising while permitting the sale of the hitherto banned article.

Griffith declared that the anti-advertising section of the law penalizes Kansas newspapers while papers and magazines published in other states and circulated in Kansas are free to use such advertising.

Ray Calihan, assistant attorney general, explained the intent of the legislature was to repeal the anti-cigarette law only as it applied to adults and to retain both the sales and advertising restrictions for the protection of minors. In so doing, he said, the legislature provided for a proper exercise of the state's police power.

Al F. Williams, United States district attorney, also took part in the case as counsel for the newspapers. He pointed out that the purpose of the new law is to raise revenue through a sales tax on cigarettes. It is to the state's interest, therefore, he said, to encourage the sale of cigarettes.

The law cannot protect Kansas youth against cigarette advertisements, he said, because magazines published in other states are read by all intelligent people.

A decision will be rendered in 30 days.

40,000,000

1927 Appropriation in—

INDIANA—

In 1927, Indiana's highway program calls for the expenditure of approximately forty million dollars for highway construction and maintenance. The cities and local communities contributed $25,000,000 towards this appropriation.

This huge investment is a good example of the way Indiana's people carry out public improvement on a big scale.

It is also a good indication that the State is prosperous, which naturally reflects on the enterprise and industry of its citizens.

National advertisers always place Indiana on their A1 list of preferred territories because their advertising brings direct and immediate results.

PENNSYLVANIA GROUP MEETS AT WAYNESBORO

Publishers Association Now Has 176 Members and Is on Sound Financial Basis Officers Report —Eyerly Presides

While business had to fight for attention against the strong counter attractions of golf and sightseeing, the members of the Pensylvania Newspaper Publishers Association made progress at the annual summer convention which closed Saturday, June 18, at Waynesboro. For the first time since it was organized two years ago, the officers were able to report that the income from dues is sufficient to balance the budget without calling upon the guarantors for further contributions.

With 176 members, the Pennsylvania Newspaper Publishers Association is the largest state association of daily and weekly newspapers in the United States. But the members will not stop there. One of the most important matters considered at the summer convention was an increase in membership. This work will go ahead under the leadership of the regional chairmen and the direction of Albert W. Fell, the manager.

Nearly half of the membership of the association was in attendance at the convention. The meeting was social in many of its aspects, the wives and children of many of the publishers being present at the informal dinner Friday evening and the banquet Saturday evening.

The "keynote speech" of the convention was delivered at the Friday morning session by Edward J. Lynett, publishers of the Scranton Times. Mr. Lynett had been assigned the topic "Has individuality in the publisher's chair ceased to count?" His answer was decided by in the negative. Mr. Lynett's address is carried in detail on another page of this issue.

Mr. Lynett's address was followed by general discussion. John L. Stewart, of the Washington Observer-Reporter, former president of the association, said that he was not a chain newspaper owner but the head of a group of newspapers in his region. He explained that his group has been a natural growth and that in all cases he has endeavored to build-up an organization which can carry on the newspaper in his absence.

The first session of the convention was held Friday morning with President Paul R. Eyerly of the Bloomsburg Morning Press, presiding. John G. Benedict of Waynesboro extended the greetings of the Waynesboro Chamber of Commerce. The response was made by Past President Stewart. Charles R. Long of the Chester Times presided at the general forum at which Ross W. Kellogg, director of the Empire State School of Printing at Ithaca told of the organization and operation of the school. Mr. Kellogg extended to the newspaper publishers of Pennsylvania an invitation to visit the school and also to make use of its facilities.

Professor Franklin Banner of the department of journalism, Penn State College, told of the interest which the students at the college are taking in journalism. Although a comparatively new department, the journalism department had a large enrollment including the sons of many Pennsylvania publishers. Professor Banner said that the department hopes to include courses in printing so that the students may obtain practical knowledge of the mechanics of publishing.

The discussions at the Saturday morning session were mostly relative to labor conditions. A special committee was authorized to continue an investigation of several matters brought out in the discussion.

At the informal dinner Friday evening, David Lawrence, publisher of the United States Daily spoke on "The Trend of the Times," W. P. Beazell, New York World, also spoke and Strickland Gillilan entertained in his characteristic manner.

COMPOSING FOREMEN MEET

L. A. Link of Waterloo (Ia.) Courier Heads Iowa Mechanical Group

Twenty-five newspaper composing-room heads, representing approximately two-thirds of Iowa's daily newspapers, were present June 13-14 to attend the first convention of the Iowa Newspaper Composing-Room Executives' Association, held at the Waterloo (Ia.) Courier plant.

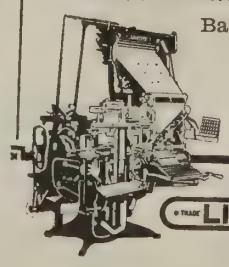
The principal address of the morning session was given by W. E. Wines, manager of the mechanical department, American Newspaper Publishers' Association, who came direct from Harrisburg, Pa., where he attended the A. N. P. A. mechanical conference.

Leon A. Link, composing-room foreman of the Waterloo Courier, was elected president, with Thomas Kelly, of the Davenport Times, vice-president, and Leo J. Carle, of the Mason City Globe-Gazette, as secretary and treasurer.

Speakers on the program were Jackson McCoy, general manager of the Courier; W. A. Reed, editor of the Waterloo Tribune; A. N. Pruess, linotype machinist of the Courier; J. C. Youngblood, Dubuque Telegraph-Herald; Thomas Kelly; Ed Funk, Waterloo Tribune, and Frank T. Harrison, Des Moines Register.

Davenport was chosen as the 1928 convention city.

From the Linotype Mailbag



"Telegraph Service in 24 Hours"

"About 4 o'clock one afternoon I wired the Chicago office for repairs for Machine 2208L, and the following afternoon received them at 4:50. This is really an extraordinary service, taking less than twenty-four hours to get a message to Chicago and a reply in return. To say that I was dumbfounded when the special delivery clerk walked into our plant with the parts is expressing it lightly. Heretofore I have carried a rather expensive kit of repairs for the Lino, but you can guess now that outside of a few star wheels and fiber buffers for the assembler, that my repair kit will consist of a bunch of Western Union Telegram blanks.

"This service is really exceptional when you consider that Baldwin, Kansas, is a considerable distance from Chicago, and that air mail was not used by either your company or myself, in the transaction."

American Firms Spending Millions to Advance Their Products in Antipodes Says Sydney Agency Man

"Australia is becoming Americanized," W. O. Richards of W. O. Richards, Ltd., Sydney Agency, declared recently in telling of the expansion of American markets and the development of American methods on that continent. Mr. Richards, president of the Publicity Club of Australia and editor of the Australian Manual & Newspaper Directory, was in New York for a short visit to study American publishing and advertising plants, en route home from London.

"The automobile," Mr. Richards said, "has found an especially warm reception. Such well known American firms as Ford, General Motors, Studebaker and Goodyear Tire are now spending millions stirling in the establishment of vast assembly plants there to meet the Australian demand. And other American products are meeting with a similarly warm reception.

"The value of the importations last year amounted to £300,000,000.

"Australians," he claimed, "are the richest people in the world—the per capita purchasing power being 515 shillings, as against 480 in New Zealand, 420 in the Argentine, 410 in the United States."

The two countries making the strongest bid for the Australian market, Mr. Richards continued, are Great Britain and the United States. American methods and products are regarded highly there. The two countries have much in common. They have the same standards of living, and are possessed of the same ability to purchase and the same desire to spend. Great Britain, however, has made a much more concerted effort to "capture" Australia.

"I cannot quite understand why principal Australian newspapers, for ample, have no representatives in New York. In London, practically ev newspaper has direct representation.

"I venture to predict that Australia the U. S. A., tied as they are by kins and the same progressive spirit, will a few years be linked by thorough mutual understanding."

A DEEP suspicion had been abroad that Earl Carroll was feigning ill- ess to escape the bars of the gloomy deral prison. He is a man of consider- ble wealth and there has been a very xtraordinary attempt by his friends to vert the consequences of his audacious erjury before a federal grand jury which as investigating his disgusting bath-tub publicity stunt. When Carroll became unconscious on a train en route to Atlanta and was taken to the hospital in the South Carolina city, those who believe that money can buy immunity for almost any prisoner in this country began to wisely smirk. The case of Charles W. Morse was recalled. The one-time 'Ice King' of New York, a ruthless pirate of modern business, feigned illness and induced reputable physicians and others to recommend his pardon to President Taft and thus defeated justice. It seems to me there was ample justification for any reporter, with a sense of public duty, in keeping a sharp eye on Earl Carroll's movements. The acid test of Mr. Sommers' exploit is that if Carroll has been feigning illness, which apparently he was not, and this reporter by reason of his enterprise had been able to reveal the fact, we should have acclaimed him as a newspaper hero. The Government would have been served and cynicism regarding the system of justice would have been rebuked. In newspaper reporting the test of conduct is based on the old rule of the end justifying the means, which is safe enough when reporters are gentlemen by instinct.

SOME years ago a reporter named Japp learned that conditions were not right in an insane asylum in Ohio and got employment there. For weeks he worked as a nurse and then brought out an exposé of cruel neglect of helpless patients that startled the community and resulted in a reform that more than justified the deception. It was a magnificent public service. Reporters who covered that assignment might have gone on to this day politely applying for news to the superintendent's office, without discovering the hideous fact that mental deficients were suffering agonies behind those walls. Who shall say that Japp was not the better reporter?

MORE than 20 years ago at Washington Miss Sybil Wilbur, who later became famous for her writings on Christian Science, tested out for a local newspaper the question whether a sane person could be committed to St. Elizabeth's Asylum. She went to Lafayette Park and began to feign symptoms of insanity and soon found herself under arrest. A board of examiners tested her and she was committed. After the transaction was complete she wrote a statement of her experiences and its publication created wide interest. However, the physicians she had so neatly taken in proposed to turn the tables on her and began to insist that she was insane and should be held. No saner woman ever lived, of course, and after the newspaper's editors had demonstrated that Miss Wilbur had taken the assignment with the knowledge and consent of the editor she was released.

THERE is, of course, a sneaky spying into private affairs that is intolerable in the pursuit of journalism as it is elsewhere. The "waste-basket" searcher and the "key-hole listener" must be out for news that cannot be obtained in ordinary channels and is of very great importance. They must not be searching for mere scandal. Their quest must be for evidence in behalf of a public cause. Every well-balanced newspaper man knows where to draw the line of propriety and right in such matters.

AN evening newspaper on one occasion came out with a great local beat. The publisher of the opposition paper, humiliated by the defeat, called his city editor onto the carpet and demanded an explanation. The flushed city editor exclaimed: "This story was obtained by a reporter who misrepresented himself. It was a sneaky piece of business. My staff is composed of ladies and gentlemen who would not stoop to such practices." To which the veteran publisher replied: "I am glad that we have a staff that is well grounded in the ethics of the profession, but I think it should be enlarged by the reporter who has given this beat to our opposition. Let's have at least one man who will stoop to get news like that."

CURTIS ADVERTISING MAINE

A full page rotogravure advertisement on Maine's hospitality, scenery and climate, with particular emphasis on the attractions of Camden Harbor, is being published in several of the leading newspapers of the country this month at the personal expense of Cyrus H. K. Curtis, Philadelphia publisher who is a native of Maine. The amount of the expenditure is nearly as much as the entire amount which will be spent this year by the Maine Development Commission on newspaper advertising.

By JAMES MELVIN LEE

BERT LESTON TAYLOR during his lifetime was always a favorite columnist of newspaper men. Indeed, during the twenty years that he conducted his column on the Chicago Tribune he came near being—and possibly did win the recognition—the dean of American column conductors.

Consequently newspaper men will be interested in "Motley Measures" (Alfred A. Knopf) which contains some of the most clever verse that B. L. T. ever put in his column.

Two of the poems in "Motley Measures" are of special interest. One thus takes up "The Jester of Yesteryear:"

"Once upon a midnight dreary"—
Wait a moment, do not go;
This is not another weary
Paraphrase of Mr. Poe.
True, the volume that I pondered
Was of quaint, forgotten lore
That got by (but how, I wondered!)
In the days entitled "yore."

Things were gathered in this volume
Over which our fathers roared—
Gems from many a by-gone colyum,
Writ by Billings, Twain and Ward.
Some of it, of course, was funny,
More was sad as sad can be.
How it ever got the money
Is a miracle to me.

So, when dreary seems my colyum,
When I fear it grows a bore,
I take down that yellowed volume
Of forgotten comic lore.
Seeking vainly to discover
Something really rich and rare,
"Gosh!" I say, "if that got over,
Why should anyone despair?"

How Taylor seized upon a current news item as a theme is told in a poem well worth quoting at length:

To What Base Uses!

"Mrs. O—— now takes her daily dip at 5 in the afternoon, instead of in the morning."—Newport Item.

This is the forest primeval.
This is the spruce with the glorious plume
That grew in the forest primeval.
This is the lumberman big and browned
Who felled the spruce tree to the ground
That grew in the forest primeval.

This is the man with the paper mill
Who bought the pulp that paid the bill
Of the husky lumberjack who chopped
The lofty spruce and its branches lopped
That grew in the forest primeval.

This is the publisher bland and rich
Who bought the roll of paper which
Was made by the man with the paper mill
Who bought the pulp that paid the bill
Of the lumberjack with the murderous ax
Who felled the spruce with lusty hacks
That grew in the forest primeval.

This is the youth with the writing tool
Who does the daily Newport drool
That helps to make the publisher rich
Who ordered the stock of paper which
Was made by the man with the paper mill
Who bought the pulp that paid the bill
Of the husky Swede in the Joseph's coat
Who swung his ax and the tall spruce smote
That grew in the forest primeval.

This is the lady far from slim
Who changed the hour of her daily swim
And excited the youth with the writing tool
Who does the Newport drivel and drool
For the prosperous publisher bland and fat
Who ordered the virgin paper that
Was made by the man with the paper mill
Who bought the pulp that paid the bill
Of Ole Oleson the husky Swede
Who did a foul and darksome deed
When he swung his ax with vigor and vim
And smote the spruce tree tall and trim
That grew in the forest primeval.

This is the shop girl, Mag or Liz,
Who daily devours what news there is Concerning the lady far from slim
Who changed the time of her ocean swim
And excited the youth with the writing tool
Who does the daily Newport drool
For the pursy publisher bland and rich
Who bought the innocent paper which
Was made by the man with the paper mill
Who bought the pulp that paid the bill
Of the Swedish jack who slew the spruce
That came to a most ignoble use—
The lofty spruce with the glorious plume—
The giant spruce that used to loom
In the heart of the forest primeval.

An interesting foreword is contributed by Ring W. Lardner, who for six years ran a column on the sporting page of the Chicago Tribune while Taylor was conducting his "A Line O'Type or Two."

In this foreword Lardner himself thus reviews "Motley Measures:"

He maintained a lofty standard in all his writing, and particularly in his verse. You will find the contents of "Motley Measures" models of poetic structure. You will find a variety of subjects—some topical, some sober, some gay—treated in a manner never banal, always entertaining, always surprising. And I am sure you will wish, with me (I am writing in the fall of 1926), that B. L. T. had lived to sing the introduction of machine guns into Chicago's already somewhat complicated daily life, the romance of "Daddy" and "Peaches" Browning, and, most of all, America's visit from Sweet Marie, to whom only he, of all columnists, could have done full justice.

"Motley Measures" will help to establish Taylor's place in the Hall of Fame of American Columnists.

LOUIS I. JAFFE is editor of the Norfolk (Va.) Virginian-Pilot. If his run-of-paper editorials have anything like the sparkle and snap of his contribution to The Virginia Quarterly Review for July, I am going to send in my subscription. His contribution to this issue, "The Democracy and Al Smith," will doubtless draw forth many editorial comments from editors in general and from those in the South in particular.

Mr. Jaffe, before discussing Smith as a presidential candidate, discusses the democratic situation in general. He believes that its chief interest "lies in the possibility that the campaign of 1928 will jar loose some of the sectional and idealogical ideas that to-day impound the Democracy and shut it off from the tide and sweep of new national forces."

With political matters "Our Own World of Letters" does not concern itself. But what Mr. Jaffe has to say about the press situation in the South does deserve quotation. Here is what he says on that topic:

It is here that newspapers that venture to question the godliness of prohibition and the decency of its enforcement are punished by the largest number of cancellations, and it is here, too, that the heaviest reprisals are carried out against newspapers that make bold to denounce the assassination of the religious equality principle by the Ku Klux Klan. It is here that the freedom of the press is curtailed by the strictest libel laws. The party's responsibility for this situation is not direct, but it is uniformly true that its attitude to these abominations and abridgments is one of wary tolerance—never one of courageous and specific denunciation.

What James Southall Wilson, the editor-in-chief of The Virginia Quarterly Review, thinks of the contribution by Mr. Jaffe is shown by the fact that the latter's article is used to open the July number.

The issue also contains a number of other articles that are well worth perusal by members of the working press.

THREE V's in a way are said to sum up the political writing of Frank R. Kent of the Baltimore Sun. These V's stand for vivid, veracious, and virulent. Another V belongs to Kent' discussion of Senator Jim Reed in The Forum for July. This V stands for very before the other V's. Of course Mr. Kent sees Mr. Reed as a possible Democratic presidential candidate.

Mr. Kent quotes Charles G. Ross, Washington correspondent of the St. Louis Post-Dispatch, who began a report of a speech by Senator Reed as follows, "It's just Jim Reed again. That was enough to clear out the press gallery."

But how conditions in Washington have changed since Mr. Ross made that remark. Today, as Mr. Kent points out, the word that Reed is speaking makes the reporters flock to the press gallery, congressmen come over from the other end, and senators to reappear from the cloakrooms. Today Reed gets first page position when he makes a speech.

How the change was brought about is well outlined by Mr. Kent in his article in The Forum and need not be retold here.

AMONG the periodicals taking an intelligent interest in the present day tendencies of the press, The Yale Review holds an important place. Typical such articles is "Two Kinds of News" the July issue from the pen of Silas Be who was at one time connected with t editorial staff of the New York Tim

According to Mr. Bent, even in t earliest newspapers there was a distir tion, which is maintained to this da between the kind of news which can charged for, and the kind which pays f itself. He says:

At first, the two kinds of news got alo very well together, and one hand washed t other; the advertising news paid less than ha the expense of gathering and printing the oth kind of news, and occupied about half as mu space. The status of advertising was distinct inferior. It was the servant in the house; t news was the aristocratic guest. They we under the same roof, but the servant knew h place.

In the consumption of news there is saturation point. Facts alone are hard t digest and soon pall. And that is wh from Mr. Bent's point of view, our mo ıbstantial and reputable journals find it ecessary to play us "cases"—the Hall-Mills case, the Snyder case and the Daddy" and "Peaches" Browning case. ne of the few exceptions to this general tendency is the Christian Science Monitor. But then the "Monitor is not nenable to the full influence of certain conomic forces which play upon its ompetitors." The Monitor can afford minimize news of crime, and even of a, coffee, and tobacco, for it operates nder a quasi-subsidy. On occasion, owever, it minimizes news of far greater nportance, as it did on the day that the ront page of practically all the leading ewspapers carried Governor Smith's tter on Roman Catholicism and office-olding. On that day, the Monitor gave rst page position to a reply to this tter, written by the lawyer whose chal-nge had provoked it; while on the ourth page, under a modest two-column ead, was printed the big news of the ay.

Why do we tire of reading our news-aper? Mr. Bent expresses his opinion nat it may be because the selection of ews is not impartial and that, after all, he newspaper may not be a true window n the whole world. At this point I may ell quote the following:

> The newspaper is but a peephole upon the izarre and shocking and momentous. To as-onish and thrill us it reaches into the utter-ost corners of the earth, with an appearance f prodigious industry and fertility of resources; et when we come down to it there is nothing iraculous in its output. Changes are but ung again and again on the old circulation-uilding themes of sex, religion, conflict, sus-ense, violence and money.
> Nine-tenths of the news arises where it was xpected and where men have been posted to eport it; or else it flows quickly through pre-rranged channels to the press. It need only epresent some departure from the usual and xpected; this is the touchstone. The com-nodity is gathered and graded and prepared or the market like any other. The processes ave been standardized, and the men who take art in them, consciously or not, are routineers. hey are routineers, but the stuff they handle ust be out of the routine of life. Their com-nodity is not the normal, it is the standard-zed exceptional. This is the formula of cir-ulation building. This is the explanation, too, f our tiring too quickly of the news; it ex-lains why the courier has donned the cap and ells, in the shape of comic strip, "colyum," nd the popular ask-me-another.

Mr. Bent then takes up the place of dvertising in the newspaper. It was bout the year 1890 that newspaper ad-ertising first assumed its modern form n volume and persuasiveness. He quotes Don C. Seitz, former business manager of the New York World, as observing hat "until the middle of the last century most newspapers farmed out their ad-vertising." And "as late as 1884," Mr. Seitz says, "the Brooklyn Eagle sold much of its space through an outside agent. . . . . Advertising in the modern sense developed slowly. Even in 1893, when the World celebrated the tenth an-niversary under Mr. Pulitzer's ownership, the largest department store ad in the columns of the 100-page edition issued in honor of the event was but three col-umns."

In making a comparison of a news-paper of half a century ago, a quarter of a century ago, and of the present, as to the changes which have taken place in its contents, "as to news, as to advertising, as to editorials, and as to the cap and bells—the entertainment side of the performance, known to newspaper men as 'features,'" Mr. Bent gives some statistics based on figures made by Orland K. Armstrong and Delos F. Wilcox. Mr. Armstrong bases his figures on the St. Louis Republican (no longer in existence) of 1875, and the St. Louis Post-Dispatch of 1925. Mr. Wilcox studied newspapers of all sections of the country, of all sizes. Mr. Bent has selected percentages from their tables and gives the following statistics:

News	55.3	55.3	26.7
Opinion	9.6	7.1	2.2
Features	6.3	5.5	10.4
Advertising	28.9	32.1	60.5

According to Mr. Bent, 50 years ago more than half the space in newspapers was given to news; now only about one-fourth is devoted to it. He quotes Mr. Armstrong as stating that "journalistic growth in recent years has been along other lines than news. The advertisements have more than doubled in ratio to other material, and are of ten-fold volume." To show that there have been equally remarkable changes in the character of other varieties of news in the last half century, Mr. Bent gives the following percentages:

	1875	1900	1925
Sports	1.7	5.1	25.4
Business	26.9	8.2	20
Crime	4.9	3.1	10.7

On the subject of sports news, Mr. Bent says that its growth has been especially rapid during the last 15 years. At this point he quotes Mr. Damon Runyan, chief impresario of the Hearst sport sections:

> Increased circulation is the only return newspapers can hope to realize from the money and space they devote to sports. If a sports writer can't deliver circulation he isn't worth a dime.

The treatment of crime news in the newspapers comes in for its due share of space. Mr. Bent is of the opinion that the volume and display of this kind of material is a tender subject with newspaper editors, that they extenuate it on the ground that it acts as a deterrent of crime. He adds:

> Newspapers are channels of suggestion. Editors realize this when they conspire to suppress information about libel suits, and when by common consent they agree never to mention a threat against the life of the President. If the publication of crime news acted as a deterrent, a lot of it should be printed.

Mr. Bent then gives some rather detailed statistics as to the respective contributions of advertising and news to the newspaper budget. For these, however, space cannot be found in "Our Own World of Letters." I will content myself with stating that according to figures taken from unofficial reports for the year 1926 Mr. Bent says that advertising paid nearly three-fourths of the bill.

COAST GROUP ISSUES RATE-MARKET BOOK

Southern California Publishers Compile Listing of Daily and Weekly Members with Market Data

Indicative of the possibilities for co-operative selling of a field by newspaper associations is the "Rates and Markets Data" book, just published by the California Newspaper Publishers' Association. The book is four by nine inches in size and contains more than 200 pages of detailed information about Central and Southern California newspapers, all members of the association, together with pertinent facts concerning their respective fields.

The book contains data on practically every town and city in the southern half of the state, and lists one or more papers in each of these towns.

Arranged alphabetically by counties and cities, each county has a detailed description of its resources, with emphasis placed upon that in which it particularly excells. Population is tabulated, and principal cities listed.

Under the county headings appear the cities and towns within the county. City data includes population in 1920 and 1927 estimated; city and suburban population; character of population; schools; churches; banks; theatres; location; principal industries; manufacturing establishments; residential features; hotels or apartments; retail shopping section; wholesale houses; trading area; number of retail outlets by classifications; miscellaneous data.

Following data on the town or city appears information on the newspaper or newspapers. This includes the name of the publisher; day of publication; when copy must reach publisher; display rate per inch; classified rate; width of type page; depth of type page; width of column; depth of column; columns to page; commission to advertising agencies; cash discount allowed; circulation, divided according to city, rural routes, trading area and outside district.

With this detailed information incorporated in one book it is believed that these publishers will be able to make a bid for national accounts that they have heretofore been unable to attract. The data book will be particularly helpful to the weekly publishers listed.

Six months were required to compile this information under the direction of Ben H. Read, executive secretary of the California Newspaper Publishers' Association.

The publication will be distributed to advertising agencies and national advertisers. The California group is believed to be the first to prepare such a comprehensive rate and market book for its members.

Expense of publishing the book was largely defrayed by the selling of advertising space in the publication. More than 40 pages were sold, chiefly to member newspapers, with a few pages taken by a newspaper representative.

The outside cover had reproduced upon it a map of the state, with the southern half in pink stripes, circled by a band of orange. With the circle was: "The Golden Circle List—Results."

In the center of the book was a two-page spread, showing another map.

NEW LIBEL LAW OPERATIVE

Liberalized Texas Statute Went Into Effect June 14

The new libel law for Texas became effective at midnight on June 14. This new law, enacted as result of several compromises between legislators and members of the press of Texas, is generally regarded as a wise and judicious measure, protecting the citizens of the state from libellous publications, and at the same time liberalizing the press as to the publication of privileged matter.

Under the amended law fair and true reports of public meetings held in the public interest are privileged, as are impartial reports of all executive and legislative proceedings including all reports of proceedings in and before legislative committees and committees appointed by the legislature.

COAL ADVERTISING URGED

New England Dealers Hear Newspapers Praised at New London

James J. Cotter, advertising man of Boston, Mass., and W. A. Clark, also of Boston, the re-elected president of the New England Coal Dealers' Association, urged the 600 dealers in session in their 25th annual convention at the Hotel Griswold, New London, Conn., June 15-17, to use co-operative newspaper advertising as the best method of reaching the public.

Mr. Cotter said in part: "It is your plain duty to the public as well as to your own business to see that your customers get all the facts about fuel.

"You have a story more interesting and convincing than that of any competing fuel. If you will but break your silence—cease to be business hermits—and bring forward your witnesses you can prove that anthracite is the nearest approach to the perfect fuel ever offered the public.

"Let the public get all the facts clearly and they will be convinced that the arguments for anthracite are so overwhelming that it will become more and more the universal fuel for all New England.

"How should this story be presented? There is only one feasible way—by co-operative advertising."

President Clark also stressed newspaper advertising for the dealers. Newspaper advertising he described as the "most economical and efficient way."

OUR "Inquiring Reporter," with his queries put to half a dozen persons daily picked at random, conceived the idea of propounding questions such as "How long does it take to do the family washing?" and "What shrubs and what annuals do you prefer for your garden? He did his scouting in the residence section and actually rang a few doorbells each day. Then our circulation manager took to clipping the answers and mailing them to the housewives who had given them. A solicitor found them easy prospects a day or two later.—A. F. Riddle, Boise (Idaho) Capital News.

"An important message for you" was the title of a double truck cooperative advertisement of Milwaukee's leading merchants published in the Sentinel and composed entirely of telegrams. Each firm purchased space for a sample Western Union telegram, addressed it to a customer of the store, and in it included a sales message of interest to the public at large. The ad was strikingly different.—R. L.

It pays to keep a separate file of the previous year's papers on hand in the advertising department. Each solicitor can glance through it in the morning before going out on his run and check up on what his clients were doing at the same time last year. Many an inch of timely advertising is saved from being overlooked by such daily use of the files. Often a last year's ad bears repeating without taking valuable time and thought in laying out and writing a new piece of copy.—E. A.

The merchants of Franklin, Ind., recently staged a Big Bargain Day that was an unusual success. Forty-five dealers co-operated in the event, each firm offering at least one item at cost for the Bargain Day. The public was not given advance notice of the event. A special edition of the Franklin Star carrying an ad from every merchant appeared on Tuesday, with follow up ads on Wednesday and the Bargain Day Thursday. The merchants plan to repeat the affair every few weeks.—Davis O. Vandivier.

"Get Your Car Washed" could be the heading over a page of ads run regularly every Friday. Under this heading could be some copy urging folks to get their automobiles in fine shape for the week-end.—F. H. Williams.

HUNCHES

One Dollar will be paid for each idea published. Send clipping for payment.

"LITTLE Interviews" are being run daily in the Salt Lake Tribune. Under a picture of Miss Three-or Four-Year-Old is a short account of what the youngster has to say on some subject of youthful interest. And the paper certainly makes a friend or two in that family!—Dorothy D. Peede.

Get a story on the new ruling from the postal authorities on these direct-by-mail "pests," who are flooding the country with knitted ties, fountain pens, greeting cards and such stuff. Many of your readers think because they open the package they must pay for the contents. They do not. The merchants of your city will welcome the facts on this.—D. A.

Many people don't realize it, but a telegraph office messenger boy gets many assignments other than mere delivering of messages. A Sunday writer at Worcester, Mass., found that boys are used as sightseeing guides, aides to police, breakers of engagements, escorts for taking lost children home, and for a multitude of other tasks.—R. B. S.

We've read several professional articles on the year "2,000" as a forecast, and we've had some highly expert opinions on what the world will be like in that era, but what does the ordinary man and woman think about it? Try this new treatment of an old subject. Find out from the person on the street what he thinks will be going on 75 years hence. It's a subject bound to create much friendly debate.—B. A. T.

Have a reporter look over the latest edition of a good dictionary at a bookstore. Under "Addenda" or in the main index may be found new words which, through common usage, have just been recognized and admitted as a part of the English language. Any one of these new words, familiar to the public, is good for a story.—R. B. S.

"Milwaukee persons famous in the nation" was the title of a Sunday article in the Milwaukee (Wis.) Journal. Why not dig up the erstwhile citizens of your city who have sprung into the national limelight and work them into feature story?—R. L.

The Columbus (O.) Dispatch runs a three-column cartoon called "Sport Spots," in its sports section every Sunday. Some time ago it featured a scene in some well known drug store each week, with a picture of the proprietor in an upper corner and the name and address of the pharmacy. A recent cartoon in this series showed about 40 residents in a store. Names were given, also explanations as to what this and that person was doing in the store. For example, there was "Billy" Ireland, Dispatch cartoonist, "who has just bought another San Felice, listening to Ralph Beaton expound on the South Sea Islands," and a likeness of one Larry Irwin, 100-yard man at Ohio State University, at a pay telephone "calling up a girl for a date."—J. A. Weller.

A mid-western paper recently scored a "reader interest" hit when it offered a year's subscription free to the person bringing the oldest hymn book to its office. The prize winner was 333 years old. —Davis O. Vandivier.

The municipal court alone of all county courts was operating at a profit, the Fond du Lac (Wis.) Commonwealth-Reporter discovered. What is the situation in your county?—Ruben Levin, Milwaukee, Wis.

COMPARATIVE NEW ENGLAND

as your market

Value of Manufactured Wealth—

NEW ENGLAND, $6,420,000,000

6 Western States, $878,000,000

If Buying Power is measured by the value of manufactured wealth—then New England is entitled to a place under the Sun. Of course there is a substantial reason why the small eastern territory should produce nearly 8 times more manufactured wealth, for New England is truly the cradle of American industry and enterprise. Many of our great industries that have helped America become the world's industrial center were founded in these six of the original 13 colonies. These same industries are today furnishing incomes to thousands of contented New Englanders.

New England continues to prosper. It is still the most desirable market. Its wealth and buying power is an established fact and National Advertisers consider this territory of utmost importance and always include it in their distribution plans.

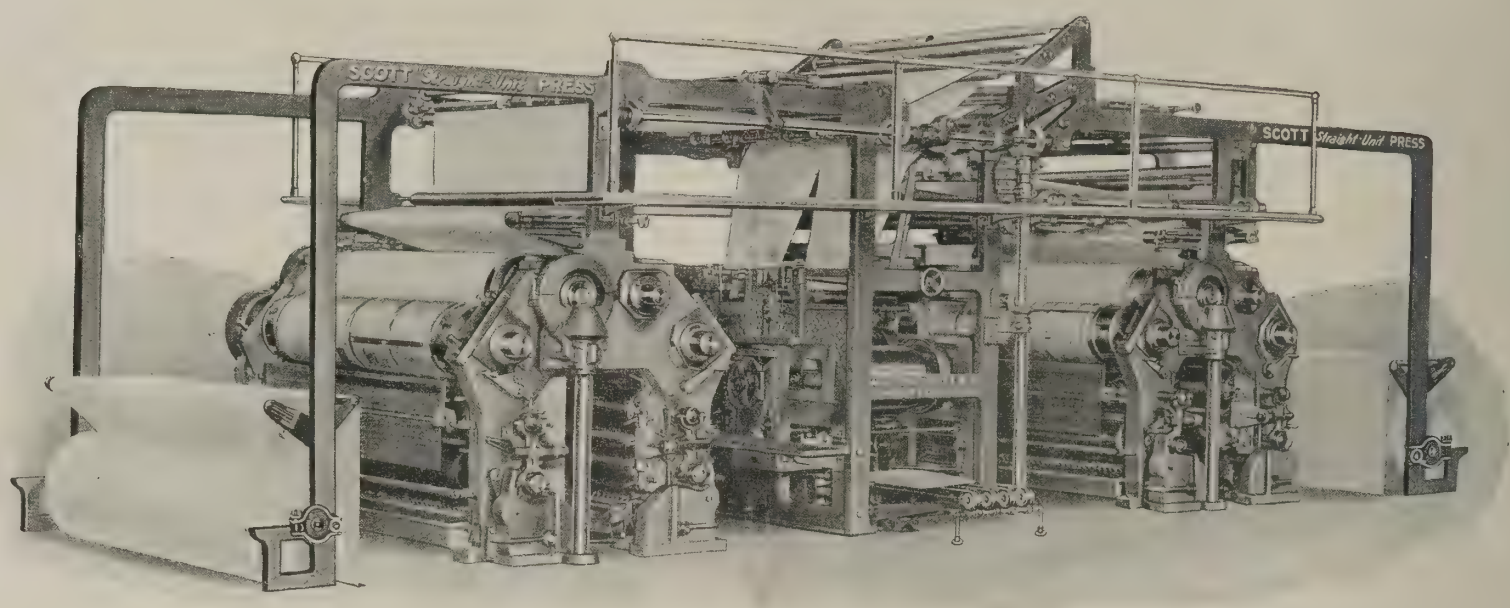
Definite!
—not diffident

FOR years New York newspapers have been bought on assumption. A certain paper is assumed to be read by a certain class or type of people. This assumption arrangement was extremely convenient in space buying, even if it wasn't true! And for years, New York newspapers were sold by the attractiveness of the impression, and the persistence with which the publisher stuck to it.

On the other hand, for some years newspapers in other cities have been analyzing, classifying and localizing their circulation, giving the figures a local habitation and a name. But because most newspapers in New York are bought from newsstands, instead of from carriers or by subscription, New York circulations escaped analysis. New York publishers were charmingly diffident as to where and to whom their papers went.

In the morning field, the publisher printed so many copies, sold them in bulk to jobbers or distributors, didn't know and sometimes didn't care where the papers went. True enough, the A B C defines city circulation and suburban circulation; but "city" meant six million people and "suburban" included three million. The situation allowed considerable imaginative enterprise.



MORE than five years ago The News established its own independent distribution, serving directly 15,000 newsdealers in the Metropolitan district. Their names and orders are on our books; our representatives call on them at least once a day; we pack, ship, deliver and collect for their orders.

From these books we make an annual distribution audit of city circulation. The 1926 audit is now ready, issued in booklet form ❦ It is available to any advertiser interested enough to ask for it. News circulation, Daily and Sunday, is distributed by New York survey districts. Population, number of families, average annual family expenditures of these districts are known. Our audit allocates our paper's sales, shows where they go, to whom they go; proportion of coverage; and coverage by expenditure groups. Percentages of population and circulation by districts are charted.

For instance the tables will show you that Central Park West, Manhattan District 13, has 23,457 families, with an average expenditure of $10,199 per family, a Daily sale of 11,329 copies, and a Sunday sale of 7,392 copies of The News; and so on for all districts in four boroughs. This audit also shows how much of any income group News circulation covers. It exposes the population and buying power of the market, the quantity and quality of News circulation.

GIVEN an intelligent understanding of the market, and advertising space in The News, you have all you need for selling New York ❦ Without obligation, follow up, liability to solicitation or personal persuasion; for your own information and a better understanding and appreciation of the New York market—may we send you this book? What does your advertising net . . .

Curiosity or Sales

In choosing the newspaper that will carry your advertising in the world's greatest market are you influenced by quantity of circulation, by inquiries received, or by actual sales resulting from advertising?

Here is a case in point, a certain manufacturer* placed similar advertisements for an oil burner in the New York Herald Tribune, and in another New York newspaper. The other paper produced more than 200 replies, the Herald Tribune 42. But the 42 Herald Tribune prospects bought 19 oil burners, while the 200 prospects of the other bought only 8.

The other newspaper produced five times as many replies—but the Herald Tribune produced nearly two and a half times as many sales.

And similar results are being recorded in every department of Herald Tribune advertising, which prove the remarkably high degree of responsiveness of the Herald Tribune's circulation.

The Herald Tribune is edited for, and is constantly read by families definitely above the average in intelligence and in buying power.

Which is why experienced advertisers have found that the Herald Tribune circulation is beyond question the most responsive in the world's greatest market.

l. A. A. Expansion Program Is Approved, C. K. Woodbridge Re-elected at Denver

Etroit Named Next Convention City at Close of Most Stirring Gathering—1,500 Delegates Attend and More Than 1,000 Ballots Cast in Hotly Contested Election

By Telegraph to EDITOR & PUBLISHER)

ENVER, COL., June 29.—Wednes- day, final day of the International ertising Association's twenty-third ovention, was a day of triple victory Detroit. C. King Woodbridge of Diroit was re-elected to his third term s presidency and his re-election signified convention's approval of the expan- program which has been known as Detroit Plan. Finally, Detroit was lected as the convention city for 1928.

t the final session of the convention, multuous meeting which lasted from until 7:55 this evening, the choice the nominating committee for the idency was overridden by a vote of for Woodbridge to 457 for Charles Younggreen, head of the Sixth Dis- i, who was the nominee placed before convention by the committee.

he committee's other nominations e accepted when by unanimous votes de Stewart of Philadelphia was elect- l ecretary and Francis Sisson of New k was elected treasurer.

r. Younggreen is member of the rtising firm of Klau-Van Pietersom- lap-Younggreen, Milwaukee. Mr. wart is publisher of the Philadelphia erd, while Mr. Sisson is vice-presi- of the Guaranty Trust Company, e York.

he contest for the presidency was one ne most stirring in the history of the nization and the pre-election cam- ns of the opposing candidates at s overshadowed the work of the con- on. The election itself was inter- ed with many exciting moments n credentials were challenged, taunts sit down" and "drag him out" were oted across the hall. Dr. David C. ess, acting as chairman, experienced greatest difficulty in restoring order. r Bayless, the "gun-toting minister" headed the Denver hospitality com- e, and possessor of a voice resem- r an oversized foghorn, must be given t for the strenuous measures which r itted adjournment only an hour or te for dinner.

Following the annual reports of Presi- n Woodbridge and other officers and eport of the nominating committee, name of Mr. Woodridge for presi- n was placed in nomination from the o by Harry T. Bussman, president of St. Louis Advertising Club. Mr. man's nominating address empha- e Mr. Woodbridge's success in turn- $35,000 deficit into a $30,000 sur- in a period of two years, commended important features of the Detroit which was approved by the club dents at a meeting in Detroit last h, and declared that under President dbridge's leadership the association just now in a position to do its twork for organized advertising. He the delegates to avoid a change of at this critical period in the or- ation's work.

e Detroit Plan, which constituted Woodbridge's platform, includes closer contact between headquarters and affiliated clubs through field men; second, plan for financing annual convention by soliciting sustaining memberships in the convention city; third, establishment of a Bureau of Advertising Co-ordination to compile information of importance to the Association's members; fourth, establishment of an official magazine; fifth, emphasis of the importance of tfie local advertising clubs in the work of the Association.

In an interview following his election President Woodbridge declared that without the support of EDITOR & PUBLISHER he would have been unable to rally the support which enables him now to carry on the work begun during his first two terms. Regarding his future plans he said:

"To me this is just a matter of going on with a piece of unfinished business which I hope I shall be able to complete."

As soon as the result of the voting was announced Younggreen congratulated Woodbridge from the floor and pledged the successful candidate his hearty co-operation. The recommendation of Tim Le Quatte that Col. Charles A. Lindbergh be made an honorary vice-president of the Association was referred to the executive committee which has power to confer this honor.

Two resolutions adopted at the final session endorsed the second A. E. F. trip to Paris in September and expressed the thanks of the Association to the city of Denver, the local Advertising Club, newspapers and various organizations and officials here for the hospitality which has marked the convention.

Frank T. Carroll, advertising director of the Indianapolis News, declined re-election to a fifth term as president of the Association of Newspaper Advertising Executives, the newspaper department of the I.A.A. Harvey R. Young, advertising director of the Columbus Dispatch, was elected to that office.

C. L. Perkins, classified advertising manager of the Chicago Herald & Examiner, was elected president of the Association of Newspaper Classified Advertising Managers. Details of these meetings appear on page 4.

The delegates on their arrival here Saturday and Sunday were greeted at the station by a yelling, whooping gang of cowboys who turned out to be Denver advertising men accompanied by similarly bedecked advertising women. Conveyances employed to carry delegates to their hotels varied from Yellow Cabs to ancient stage coaches and from fire trucks to the police department's "Black Maria."

More than 500 delegates were the guests of the Rocky Mountain News and Denver Evening News, Scripps-Howard papers, on an outing at Troutdale, about 50 miles from Denver, Sunday. The delegates have been invited on expeditions to Estes Park and the Moffat Tunnel Thursday under the auspices of the Denver Post.

At the meeting the Advertising Commission Monday, George M. Burbach, advertising director, St. Louis Post-Dispatch, was elected chairman, succeeding W. Frank McClure. Other officers elected were Merrit Lum, Chicago, vice-chairman, B. A. Kittredge, Boston, secretary.

Robert A. Warfel of New York was re-elected executive secretary. Almost 1,500 delegates representing 88 clubs attended the convention.

IDEA SPARKS BROADCAST AT DENVER

"THE old fashioned high pressure salesman, who would stop at nothing to sell his own medium, has no place in the world today. Every year sees a dwindling in the numbers of those newspaper men who go about knocking the magazines, and the magazine men who knock the newspapers are just as rare. Why is this change? Principally, because it does not pay. It is not good selling in view of modern knowledge and practice. The advertiser of today expects the man who calls upon him to be versed in all the problems of his campaign; expects him to be honest in his appraisal of other advertising mediums in addition to his own."—GILBERT T. HODGES, president of the New York Advertising Club and member of the executive board of the New York Sun.

"ADVERTISING has undoubtedly been an important factor in the gain of national income from 33 billions of dollars in 1914 to the amazing total of 89 billions of dollars in 1926. In nearly every decade there are men who believe the country has reached a saturation point and who fear that they will find trouble in maintaining their volume of business in the face of growing competition. Actually, however, conditions are now more favorable than at any time in the history of the country. We have today a smoothly running financial mechanism, such as the past never knew, which, if properly managed, should aid materially in preventing fiscal panics and enable efficient business interests to operate nine years out of ten without seeing red ink in their annual statements."—FRANCIS H. SISSON, vice-president, Guaranty Trust Company of New York.

"IT requires no great stretch of the imagination to foresee the solution of the Mississippi flood control problem lying in the restricted issuance of useless publicity. As everyone knows, paper is made from wood pulp. If the trees required to make all the wood pulp used in mimeographing a year's supply of useless publicity were left standing in the northwest, there probably would be no spring floods to wash the hen houses of the poor Acadians into the Gulf of Mexico. Or, if it is too late to save the trees, the mimeographed sheets might be gathered and converted directly into levees. Thus the floods undoubtedly quickly would be curbed. Nor is it inconceivable that enough mimeographed paper would be left

McQuiston Tells Success of All-Newspaper Advertising Plan —Postoffice Official Addresses Classified Managers' Group

(By Telegraph to EDITOR & PUBLISHER)

DENVER, June 29.—The striking success of the Westinghouse Electric company's all-newspaper advertising campaign was described for the Association of Newspaper Advertising Executives at the Denver convention of the I. A. A. by J. C. McQuiston, Westinghouse advertising manager.

The results, he declared, had fully justified the action of his company in confining its large current campaign to the daily newspapers. The policy followed by Westinghouse in the past when magazines and other media were employed provided McQuiston with a basis of comparison on which the daily press has made a gratifying showing. The flexibility of newspaper advertising for national campaigns, permitting the use in various sections of different and appropriate copy, and the high reader interest of the dailies were emphasized by the speaker.

Harvey R. Young, advertising director, Columbus (O.) Dispatch was elected president of the group succeeding Frank T. Carroll, of the Indianapolis News. Other officers elected were: Vice-president, John F. Tims, Jr., business manager, New Orleans Times-Picayune; secretary-treasurer, Don Bridge Indianapolis News.

Measures to prevent the publication of fraudulent advertisements in the classified section formed one of the main themes at the sessions of the classified managers. The group was addressed by Roy E. Nelson, postoffice inspector of Denver, who explained how the Postoffice Department will co-operate with newspapers to punish those who attempt to use the classified columns for fraudulent purposes. For officers of the Association the candidates presented by the nominating committee were accepted unanimously: President, C. L. Perkins, Chicago Herald and Examiner; vice-president, W. W. Murdock, Detroit Free Press; second vice-president, O. S. Weste, Louisville Courier-Journal; treasurer, J. J. McGovern, Albany Knickerbocker Press; secretary, E. F. Emmel, Indianapolis Star; Directors, W. F. Hershey, Cincinnati Enquirer; O. M. Dempsey, St. Paul Dispatch; A. R. Koehler, Chicago Tribune.

J. E. Morehead, of the Denver Ad Club, was elected president of the Club President group and chairman of the Club Officers Conference. Morehead, the first man to hold both these offices simultaneously, announced his intention to establish a club service department which will serve as a means of exchanging information of value among all club officers in order that all may have the benefit of ideas and plans each club has found successful. The midwinter conference of club presidents probably will be called by Mr. Moorhead to meet in St. Louis when matters of club organization will be discussed.

Harry T. Bussman, president of the St. Louis Advertising Club was elected secretary of both the club presidents' and club officers groups.

"Rightly used, advertising is just as truly an investment as bonds or a savings bank book; it often pays a higher yield," declared Rhey T. Snodgrass, advertising director of the Minneapolis Journal, in an address before the A. N. A. E.

"Advertising," Mr. Snodgrass pointed out, "becomes the greatest asset in any business, good-will. This is an asset often more valuable than plants, machinery, and goods in process. It is not intangible, it is real money. It certainly is an investment."

"Not only has the volume but the variety of newspaper advertising increased amazingly in recent years," F. St. John Richards, manager of the Eastern office of the St. Louis Globe-Democrat, in New York, told the Association.

"This increase in the variety of classifications of newspaper advertising," Mr. Richards said, "has made necessary and increased knowledge of the conditions surrounding these various lines of business in the territory covered by our newspapers, and no newspaper representative can hope intelligently or successfully to sell his paper's advertising space unless he has at hand accurate information regarding the market in his territory for the advertiser's product.

"Just how far a publisher should go in his co-operation with national advertisers is, of course, a matter of business judgment for which no set rule can be made. Conditions vary and each case must be decided on its individual merits.

"Service work asked for by the representatives has as much value for you as for the advertiser. It brings you in close contact with the people of your town and particularly with the merchants. You learn of prospective campaigns of national advertising from them, when you in turn are telling them of others. The tie-up advertising which national advertisers desire, furnishes you with an added opportunity to sell your paper to the local advertiser.

"Some of the service requests made by advertisers and agents and forwarded to you by your representatives may seem extreme and undoubtedly many are. But there is almost always something about the proposition which would fit in with the possibilities, as you see it, and what appears reasonable to you would most likely satisfy the advertiser. He generally words his request to cover every possible service all newspapers could give and does not expect to get it all from everyone. Take surveys, for instance. A manufacturer of a hair bleach may ask the number of beauty parlors in your town or territory, number of drug stores, department stores, other outlets, etc., and put in for good measure an inquiry as to how many of your women readers are blondes or brunettes. He would probably be satisfied if you guessed at the last question. Or your representative might forward a request that you call on all the preachers in your town and try to get testimonials of some medicinal tonic which might be suspected of containing more than a little alcohol. Your prompt comeback that you would see him in some warmer clime first, would have to be translated by your representative into a firm but dignified statement that you did not find it possible to comply with the request as made, but that if the advertisers would furnish a list of preachers in your town who used the tonic, you would gladly ask them what they thought of it.

"Your representative is on the firing line, meeting competition daily and hourly and can tell you what others are doing. And let me tell you there never was a time when the sellers of newspaper space had to work harder than now. There is more business to get, but there are more people trying to get it."

IVY LEE EXPLAINS HIS PRESS AGENT WORK

'Published" Subway Sun and Elevated Express Among Other Things He Testifies at Transit Hearing —Received $212,000 in Salary and Service Fees Since 1919

'VY LEE, king of the press agents, was ' this week afforded an opportunity to ell under oath just what he can accomlish for a client.

He was testifying Monday before the ansit commission of New York State, s an employe of the Interborough Rapid ransit Company which pays him $12,000 year and expenses. This totalled from une 30, 1919, to April 30 last, $212,-54.19.

Samuel Untermyer, who did the ques-oning, wanted to know what service Mr. ee gave in return for this sum.

In reply, Mr. Lee testified that he pre-ared the Subway Sun and the Elevated xpress, single sheet broadsides that are asted up on New York Subway train indows, informing customers of sched-led events on these transit lines. Also n these broadsides Mr. Lee had at one me advocated an increased fare. New orkers still pay five cents for a ride on ther subway, elevated or surface car.

"What is the difference," Mr. Unter-yer wanted to know, "between the voca-on you follow and that of a publicity gent?"

"I don't know sir," said Mr. Lee.

"Is there any?"

"I don't know, sir."

Then Mr. Lee hastily added:

"I have never been able to find a satis-ictory phrase to describe what I try to ."

He did, he remembered, advise his ients on public relations.

"When you say you advise them on ublic relations, what do you mean?," Ir. Untermyer asked.

"Well," replied Mr. Lee, "practically very large corporation has, of course, ery important relations with the public. is important to study the operation of ublic opinion, study the attitude of the ublic. It is very important that the rporation or interest should make nown its activities so they will be under-ood, and my work is to assist, so far as can, in enabling corporations to do this."

"You mean in placing their affairs be-re the public through publicity methods the most favorable light?" Mr. Unter-yer continued.

"That, and also so shaping their affairs at when placed before the public they ill be approved," Mr. Lee said.

"Are you concerned with shaping the fairs of these corporations?"

"I am very often consulted with refer-ce to their policies, yes, sir," Mr. Lee id.

"Have you had a part in shaping the fairs of the Interborough Rapid Transit ompany?" Mr. Untermyer asked.

"I have been consulted very often with gard to various policies in the Inter-rough," was Mr. Lee's answer. "I ve assisted them in the development of eir labor policy, in the development of eir plan of employe representation."

"You mean in setting up the company ion?" asked Mr. Untermyer, referring the Interborough Brotherhood.

"I will have to disagree with you on e phrase 'company union,'" replied Mr. e. "I assisted Mr. Quackenbush in awing up the tentative constitution hich was presented to the men for their onsideration."

"And you looked after the labor pub-lity?"

"Either myself or my office, so far as e could," Mr. Lee said.

Mr. Lee said that part of his work for e Interborough consisted of the pre-aration of the Subway Sun and the Ele-ted Express. He said at first that the bway Sun had not carried any in-eased fare propaganda and then ad-tted that it had some years ago.

'Do you know what it cost the city run the Subway Sun and the Elevated press since the dual contracts were put o effect?" Mr. Untermyer asked.

Mr. Lee replied that he did not, and r. Untermyer said that the Subway Sun cost from June 30, 1919, to June 30, 1926, $36,475, and the Elevated Express $38,544, and that payments to Mr. Lee included $39,078 for printing and $14,029 for miscellaneous items.

Mr. Untermyer asked Mr. Lee if he knew that all the payments to him for salary, expenses and the Subway Sun and the Elevated Express had been charged against the operating expenses of the Interborough, and were therefore a charge against the city.

"You see, do you not, that the city has to bear the expense, inasmuch as it is deducted as an expense before the division for profits?" Mr. Untermyer asked.

"I will answer to you that I also see that the city gets the benefit of such services as are rendered," Mr. Lee said.

"What benefit did the city get from this propaganda for an increase in fare when the company was under agreement with the city to maintain a five-cent fare?"

"If the action of public authority should be responsive to this propaganda and the fare increased, the city would benefit very greatly," Mr. Lee said.

"Notwithstanding that it had contracted for a five-cent fare, you think the city would benefit, and therefore the city ought to relinquish the five-cent fare —is that your idea?" asked Mr. Untermyer.

"I think it would be very much in the interest of the city to relinquish it," said Mr. Lee.

"It would benefit the city at the expense of the car rider, who would pay the increased fare, would it not?"

"Well, the car rider would be so much benefited that it would be to his interest," was Mr. Lee's answer.

"It would furnish more subways, would it?" asked Mr. Untermyer.

"Yes, sir," said Mr. Lee, "because it would constitute an inducement to private capital to put up the money promptly to build the subways."

"And the more you charged the car rider the more profit there was in in for private capital, the more subways there might be; is that your idea?" Mr. Untermyer continued.

"No, sir," said Mr. Lee. "When the fare was sufficient to yield a sufficient net return to private capital you would get an adequate amount of capital to build the subways required."

"Yes, and the higher the fare the more capital you would get?"

"I think that is reductio ad absurdum," replied Mr. Lee.

Mr. Lee admitted that the elected city officials were opposed to any fare increase at the time he assisted the Interborough to prepare increased fare arguments.

"Do you think that it was proper for you to assume that you knew what was in the interest of the city, when the duly elected city authorities were opposed to it?" Mr. Untermyer asked.

"Yes, sir," said Mr. Lee. "It is conceivable that their favoritism for a five-cent fare was to get votes."

Mr. Lee said that he knew that the people of the city had voted overwhelmingly for the retention of the five-cent fare, but defended the promulgation of increased fare propaganda nevertheless. "We thought that if the people ever realized the facts, they would vote for an increased fare," he explained.

"I want all your propaganda," Mr. Untermyer said in telling Mr. Lee he wished copies of all material he had prepared for the Interborough. "It is a large order, it is not?"

"Not so very large," said Mr. Lee. "Not in volume."

"Not large in volume, but the result of a great deal of thought and ingenuity," Mr. Untermyer commented.

"Yes, sir," said Mr. Lee with a smile.

Asked to name some other service he had performed, Mr. Lee said that he had educated the public to appreciate the substitution of turnstiles before their introduction on the I. R. T. The witness said that, by preparing the people for the substitution of the mechanical device for the human ticket chopper, considerable money had been saved to the company. Mr. Lee in this part of his testimony treated the turnstiles on the I. R. T. as a novelty.

"Had you made any study of the use of these turnstiles before they were put in?"

"No, sir."

"Did you not know that they were in use on the B. M. T. before they were put in on the Interborough?"

"No, sir."

"You did not know that?"

"No, sir."

"Well," observed Mr. Untermyer, "that is a fact."

James L. Quackenbush, counsel for the Interborough, volunteered that there was only a comparatively small number of turnstiles in use on the B. M. T. at the time. Toward the end of Mr. Lee's examination Mr. Untermyer asked:

"How would the company be injured, Mr. Lee, if it should have the misfortune to lose your services and gain $12,000 a year and expenses?"

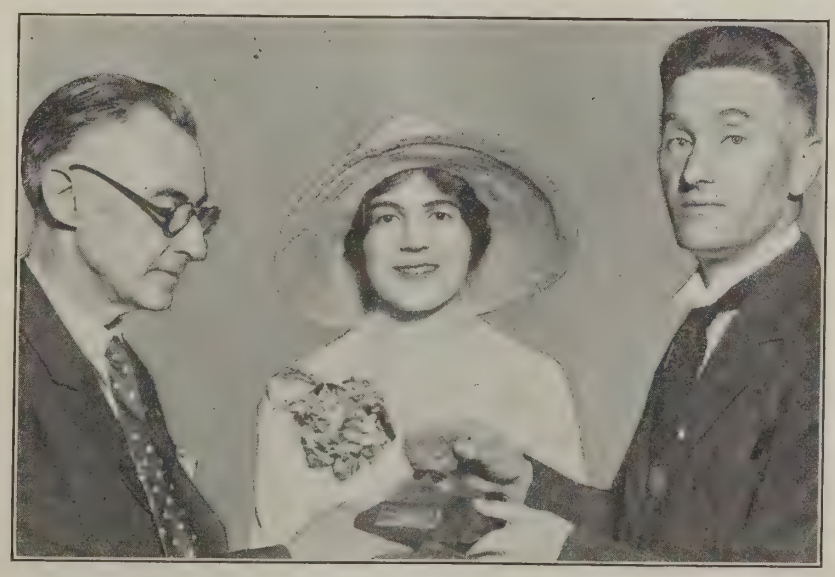
"I am afraid I cannot answer that question," said Mr. Lee.

"Can you point to any great loss that would pursue the company?"

"I would not point to any; no, sir," Lee replied.

Mr. Lee said that he had no objection to disclosing the names of other clients, and mentioned among them the Bethlehem Steel Company, Pennsylvania Railroad, Armour & Co., the Rockefellers and the Standard Oil Company.

"They are all salaried employments, are they not?" Mr. Untermyer asked.



"Either salary or retainer," Mr. Lee replied. "My work is done on somewhat the basis of a law office."

"You mean you get a retainer whether you do anything or not?"

"In the same sense that a lawyer does," Mr. Lee retorted.

Mr. Lee said that the time he spent in person on Interborough work varied, but that two members of his staff were in constant touch with the company's affairs.

MILWAUKEE EDITORS PUNCH TIME CLOCK

"Definitely Helpful System, Providing Automatic Record" Says Creager, M. E.—Due Allowance Made for Reporters

Use of a time clock in the editorial department of the Milwaukee Journal was described this week as a "definitely helpful system" by Marvin H. Creager, managing editor. Mr. Creager denied a report printed in New York that the staff objected to "punching in and punching out."

"There has been no objection by our staff to our time clock system which was installed three years ago," said Mr. Creager. "It was put in as a general control and with no idea of an exact daily count of hours.

"Desk workers and those whose hours are fairly regular are provided with a definite record as a result of it. It is, of course, impossible for reporters always to register their exact hours, and due allowance is made in their case.

"We find the system definitely helpful as providing an automatic record. Editorial employes have found it in no way irksome. In fact it is generally recognized as a good thing."

PAID SPACE INCREASED BY COPPER GROUP

124 Newspapers on Present List—80 Per Cent of Appropriation to Dailies, 20 Per Cent to Magazines

Increased use of paid space in newspapers by the Copper and Brass Research Association, 25 Broadway, New York, was forecast this week by B. B. Caddle, association manager, coincident with the appointment of Dorrance, Sullivan & Co., New York advertising agency, to handle the account. The Frank Presbrey Company formerly handled the association's paid advertising.

"When we started paid advertising we divided our appropriation about fifty-fifty between newspapers and the magazines," Mr. Caddle told EDITOR & PUBLISHER. "We found that newspapers were the best media, and now our appropriation is divided into 80 per cent for newspapers and 20 per cent for magazines. At present we are placing copy in about 124 newspapers."

Mr. Caddle said that a meeting of the association would be held in New York on Oct. 13. Then the appropriation for 1928 would be decided upon. The association, according to Mr. Caddle, was organized on the recommendation of Ivy Lee, and Mr. Lee will continue to be retained as counsel on public relations.

It measures 138 by 26 feet. All the second floor will be used for editorial room, composing room, and stereotype department. The business office will be on the third floor.

The present Graphic plant will be demolished to permit enlargement of City Hall Park.

TO ARBITRATE COAST ENGRAVERS STRIKE

Union Men Return to Work on Portland Dailies After a Week of Idleness—Big Increase Asked

(By Telegraph to EDITOR & PUBLISHER)

PORTLAND, Ore., June 29.—Members of the Photo-Engravers Union employed by the engraving departments of Portland newspapers, who have been on strike since Wednesday noon of last week, returned to work today, pending arbitration of their demands. Their action constituted acceptance of the publishers' offer to arbitrate, made to officers of the Union before the strike was called.

The men were paid $51.50 a week for day work and $54.50 a week for night work, a week's work being 44 hours or an average of 7 1-3 hours each day. The union demanded $60 a week for day work and $65 for night work, with a week of 42 hours and certain changes in working conditions.

The newspapers immediately offered to place the affair before either a local arbitration board or the International Board. According to the procedure followed in the past, this offer was declined and the engravers stopped work.

FOUR BOSTON POST MEN INDICTED FOR PRINTING GOV. SMITH ARTICLE

Business Manager and Three Editorial Men Plead Not Guilty of Violating Copyright Law—Given 30 Days to File Demurrers

FOLLOWING indictment by the federal grand jury at Boston last Friday charging them with violating copyright laws by premature publication of the Atlantic Monthly's article, "Catholic and Patriot," by Governor Alfred Smith, four members of the Boston Post staff pleaded not guilty before Judge James A. Lowell in Federal Court, Boston, Tuesday.

The men indicted were William A. Grozier, business manager; Edward J. Dunn, city editor; George Richards, night city editor, and Fred H. Thompson, reporter. Each was released in $250 bail pending hearing. The court granted them 30 days in which to file demurrers or other pleas.

Two counts are charged against each in the indictment, one alleging violation of the copyright law, the other with aiding and abetting an infringement of the same by the alleged premature publication in Boston Post of April 16 last of the article which the Atlantic Monthly asserts it owned and copyrighted. The magazine already has filed suit for $400,000 against the Boston Post Publishing Company.

Judge Lowell also Tuesday gave hearing in the habeas corpus proceedings concerning Fred Thompson, reporter, recently ordered by Governor Fuller extradited to New Hampshire to face charges there. It is charged Thompson procured copies of Gov. Smith's article through a night watchman employed by the Rumford Press at Concord, N. H., which prints the Atlantic Monthly. The court expressed reluctance to interfere with the extradition, but finally directed Attorney Edmund A. Whitman, representing Thompson, and Assistant Attorney General Ralph W. Stearns to file briefs on the question of Federal Court jurisdiction no later than Friday, July 1.

Thompson based his petition for a writ of habeas corpus on allegations that he was being improperly and illegally transferred to New Hampshire. Thompson's counsel declared that as the Federal Court was the only court in which proceedings had been brought and as no Massachusetts court had assumed jurisdiction, he was properly in Federal Court and the case should be threshed out there.

William A. Grozier, Post business manager, in a statement to an EDITOR & PUBLISHER representative, when questioned regarding indictment, said: "I personally do not know anything about the matter and therefore I haven't anything to say about it."

The indictments against the four Post men allege that they unlawfully, knowingly, fraudulently, and for their own profit did infringe the Atlantic Monthly copyright by reprinting the article without the consent of the magazine.

The men are specifically charged with violation of Section 28 of the Copyright Act, which follows: "Wilful Infringement for Profit—Any person who wilfully and for profit shall infringe any copyright secured by this title, or who shall knowingly and wilfully aid or abet such infringement, shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and upon conviction thereof shall be punished by imprisonment for not exceeding one year, or by a fine of not less than $100 nor more than $1,000, or both, in the discretion of the court."

THE KIND OF COOPERATION ADVERTISERS WANT

Majority Are Unimpressed by "Superficial" Service But Appreciate Accurate Market Data, Route Lists, And Dealer Tie-Ups, Ogle Tells A.N.A.E.—Likes Well Edited Paper Best

Following, in part, is an address delivered by Arthur H. Ogle, secretary-treasurer, Association of National Advertisers, before the convention of the Association of Newspaper Advertising Executives, in Denver, June 28.

I WANT to say at the outset that the advertising manager and every other executive having anything to do with the sales program (and in the modern business organization that includes nearly every executive) is doing more thinking now than he ever did before. Here, in the heyday of prosperity, so to speak, he is more concerned than ever with the maintenance of that condition. Why? Distribution cost!

ARTHUR H. OGLE

No other subject has had more serious consideration by manufacturers and by economists in the past year than the cost of distribution. Advertising is an important part of that cost—what part does not particularly matter, so long as it is doing its part of the job as efficiently and as economically as it has done in the past. But is it? I wish I could give you the answer. In several businesses I know definitely that it is not. In some others I happen to know that it is.

It is sufficient to know, however, that advertisers are concerned, and seriously concerned, about the effectiveness of their advertising. We in the Association of National Advertisers believe that you as publishers are quite as much concerned about that subject as we are. If there are any of you who are not, let me say without hestitation that it is time for you to be concerned about it. The problem of making advertising produce economically is no longer a simple one. It is getting and demands the most serious thought of the best brains we can bring to it.

If we can find some better method of marketing our products than through advertising, it is certain that we shall do so, or be lost in the economic struggle. But you are interested in seeing advertising maintained as the "sword arm of business." It will maintain that position only so long as it is the most effective form of marketing, and therefore I am sure that you cannot find fault with the statement that newspaper publishers are just as much concerned as advertisers with the question of making advertising more productive.

Business is organized on a competitive basis—yours no less than that of the manufacturer of tooth paste or tires. I realize that each of you is concerned about the sale and profits of his own particular business today, tomorrow, and next week. Yet you meet here to discuss your mutual problems, and it seems to me that they ar transcend in importance your day to day struggle for a few extra lines or pages of advertising. Because unless you are selling a product that will give a service commensurate with its cost, you are making advertising less instead of more productive, you are helping to increase the cost of distribution.

Never before has there been such activity among our members as is now going on in regard to trading areas. The trading area of the future must be a scientifically worked-out market, and your circulation, to be most profitable to advertisers, must fit that market. You must build it to fit the market, not to fit your ideas of where you would like to have it.

I want to tell you of a questionnaire that was sent out dealing with that particular kind of co-operation that we generally think of in connection with newspaper advertising—merchandising cooperation.

It is difficult to pull a few dominant ideas out of the mass of opinions, but there are some who are not particularly complimentary in their comments on what they describe as unimportant considerations in the selection of advertising media. Perhaps the most surprising tendency of these replies was the almost universal feeling that co-operation in the form of merchandising service cannot in any way take the place of co-operation in the shape of a well edited newspaper, well made up, going to the right kind of readers on the right kind of basis. So possibly advertisers are already being educated more than we have any notion of along the lines of constructive buying, and possibly newspaper publishers, or at least those who have had a tendency to wander a considerable distance afield in what they try to sell to advertisers, can again go back to the publishing business.

But I would not have you believe that advertisers entirely discredit the many constructive things you do to enable them to advertise more effectively in your market. They are quite in harmony that some of your methods of co-operation are highly useful, if not indispensable. They recognize your ability to give them information about your local market which they cannot now get from any other existing source. They believe that you can be very useful to them in intelligent contacts with their trade, not necessarily to sell their merchandise, but to be sure the trade recognizes the value of advertising in your newspaper that you would have us believe exists. Perhaps you would be interested in hearing some of their remarks.

The first question asked for a general opinion of the value of newspaper co-operation now given. Less than 20 per cent had anything favorable to say about it. The replies ranged all the way from "excellent" and "good" to "commonplace," "unintelligent," "very little value," "seldom vital enough to be reason for selection of paper," and "largely bunk." And there were an appreciable number of important advertisers who expressed the feeling that they were paying for a service which was valuable only to new advertisers or new products, or at best to only a limited class of advertisers. I was really astounded at the very high percentage of advertisers who can't see much good in it. Of course general answers of this kind don't mean much unless they are supported by something more specific. The question was asked more or less as a feeler, and subsequent questions sought to get this specific information:

First, what kinds of service are used and what are not?

You gentlemen could probably answer that question better than the advertisers themselves, but after all, if they're using a service and don't know it, it isn't of very much value.

Second, what sorts of co-operation advertisers want from newspapers, and what kinds they don't want.

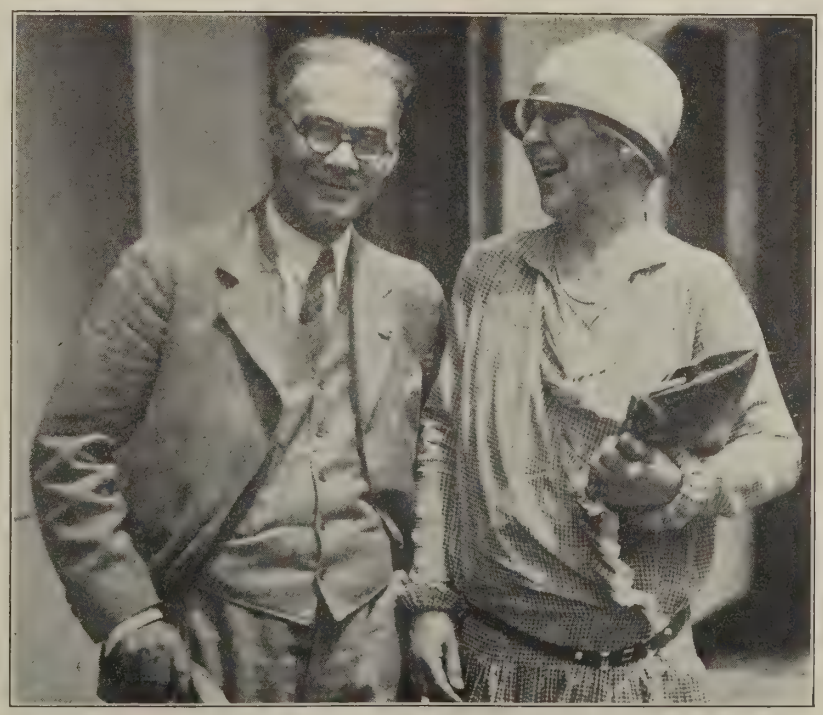
Third, specific suggestions for making newspaper advertising more profitable to the advertiser.

Now let us look at the opinions expressed on these subjects.

There is a considerable group of advertisers who use all they can get for nothing. That, I think, is as bad for them as it is uneconomic for you. It's unintelligent cooperation. Generally speaking, I don't think we're any more intelligent about the way in which we use the services we offer than you are in the offering of them. To be specific, among those manufacturers whose products have very general distribution, announcements to the trade of the coming campaign, whether in letters, broadsides, or special trade publications, are used and valued. Yet I find many comments that this sort of thing has run its course, that dealers pay no attention to it, and that it has very little value. Intelligent surveys of your local market seems the subject of next importance.

Solicitation of dealer tie-up copy, when and as requested by the advertiser, is highly valued by a number of those replying. Solicitation and distribution of window displays, route lists, retail lists and maps, seem to be next in order, with scattered mention of nearly every kind of co-operation that has ever been offered.

Now what is not used? It is difficult to be definite here—the answers come mostly by elimination, but there are some specific statements that warrant careful consideration. Here is a very big newspaper advertiser who says he has discontinued using all merchandising service because its application is fraught with so much bungling that he can't take a chance on losing his dealers' good will. Another speaks more than feelingly on the subject of improper solicitation of dealer tie-up advertising—there is more than one reference to indiscretions which have caused much loss of good will, and one member calls the entire proposition a menace.



Now we want to be constructive, or as constructive as we can, and I know you are all interested in hearing some of the suggestions given as to the best way in which newspapers could cooperate with advertisers. Perhaps you will guess what the first one is—perhaps it will be a distinct shock to some of you. "Cut out all cooperation and give us a lower rate" is a summary of the statement made more often in this questionnaire than any other suggestion. Perhaps they don't mean just that, but I do think they mean it absolutely so far as the superficial type of cooperation to which they have become accustomed is concerned. It starts as a negative sort of suggestion, but it is very positive in its conclusion. I sense in it a sort of summary of the many complaints running throughout the replies that much of the cooperative work now generally offered is unintelligently carried out, ineffective, too costly to be justified, and largely a smoke screen to get business for a publication which is not entitled to it purely on the merits of its circulation and reader interest.

Furthermore, I sense in it a question which I have heard many times: "How do you fix your rates?" Do you know how you fix your rates? Are they scientifically worked out, or are they, as one publisher said to me, based largely on what the traffic will bear? These are questions which you will have to find the answer to if you are going to cooperate fully in this job of reducing distribution cost.

The next suggestion is a negative one, too, and from my own experience I can say "amen" to it. A brief summary is about this: "Quit trying to force our hands in the selection of newspapers by soliciting us through our dealers." I guess you all know what they mean by that. I remember one busy morning when I received four long night letters requesting that we place our advertising in a particular paper in a certain southern city, and they corresponded with each other word for word. They came from four different dealers in that city, and the business we got from two of them wasn't sufficient to justify the expense of a reply. Yes, of course, we did reply. We used a form letter, too, because we knew the dealer wasn't interested anyway, but we didn't feel any too cordial toward the publisher who paid for those wires. I don't know how many of you are still guilty of that old trick, but if you are, forget it and come out in the open. It doesn't fool anyone, and it's costing you business. But advertisers do want you to be sure their dealers are educated to the value of newspaper advertising by the manufacturer, and to its proper

CORRESPONDENTS' TEN GALLON HATS DOT SOUTH DAKOTA LANDSCAPE

Eastern Writers at Coolidge Summer Home Furnishing West Its Atmosphere—Stephenson of A. P. Takes a Riding Lesson

By JAMES L. WRIGHT

Washington Correspondent, Buffalo News

STATE GAME LODGE, Black Hills, S. D. —It takes the East to give the West its Western atmosphere.

The truth of foregoing statement perhaps never has been better illustrated then it is now in the case of the Presidential visit to the Black Hills. There are more Sears-Roebuck cowboys, standing around now in the lobbies of the Harney Hotel, than there ever were real ones on the backs of Indian ponies on the plains when the buffalo herds roamed the west.

Although the natives of the Black Hills country wear fedoras and business clothes, while the girls here wear short skirts, a la Eastern flapper, a lot of young men, and some older ones, too, who thought the Alleghenies were West until they came out here a week ago, have raided the hat shops, the booteries and the clothing stores for "true Western costumes." The local retailers have had to send in telegraphic rush orders to Eastern manufacturers for more Western costumes.

On a recent Sunday at the old cowtown of Hermosa where President Coolidge went to church there were many ranchers and cattlemen, one of them owning a 15,000 acre ranch nearby, but the only "ten-gallon" hats, as the sombreros are called, were worn by the New York photographers, assigned to cover the movements of the chief executive and his wife during their summer vacation.

Colonel Edward Starling, assistant chief of the White House secret service staff, who preceded the president to the West, set the styles for the crowd. He had on a sombrero that made Tom Mix's hat look like a skull cap, and those riding trousers and leggings! One look at him and the whole secret service staff, save Richard Jervis, the chief, put in for leave in order that they might rush to town and stock up. Now Starling is known as "Hollywood Ed."

Francis M. Stephenson of the Associated Press, who has a little cabin in the woods, a short distance from the President's lodge, beat it into Rapid City to get boots, riding trousers and a chamois-skin jacket. A few days later "Dakota Clyde Jones," cowboy champion in three states, came down with a saddle horse for "Two-Gun Stevey" to ride. He told "Stevey" he would act as his guide. "Stevey's" last mount was a hobby horse in the nursery, never having been able to afford an electric horse in the gym.

"Dakota Clyde" helped him into the saddle. The cowboy jumped on the back of his wonderful sorrel. "Come on, let's go," he shouted to the tenderfoot, and a half mile up the mountain road, he looked back. "Stevey's" horse was standing just where he had left him.

"How do you get this horse started?" called out "Stevey."

"Jab your heels in his ribs," yelled "Dakota Clyde."

"Stevey" barely touched the flanks of his mount.

"Hit his neck with your bridle strap," said "Dakota Clyde."

"Stevey's" blow was a caress.

The horse did not move.

"Oh, I guess I've ridden far enough for one day," concluded the newspaper man, dismounting

Edward F. Whiting, correspondent of the Boston Herald, was the first newspaper man on the President's party to appear in Rapid City with a wide sombrero, but he has admitted to his Boston colleagues that he would not dare wear it down Tremont street in his home town. J. Russell Young of the Washington Star bought a ten-galloner at the same time, but Mrs. Young is with him here, and he has never appeared with the chapeau.

Of the photographers, J. C. Brown of the International Newsreel and Karl W. Fasold of Pathe are the only ones who stick to their sombreros religiously.

Everything that smacks of the old story book type of western life is seized upon eagerly by the Easterners. Even the silver dollars or "cart wheels" are gobbled up by the members of the president's party, the natives saying that the visitors act as though they feared there would not be any left in a few days. With five dollars in silver, the owner walks with a heavy list if he doesn't divide them between his two trouser pockets.

Indian moccasins, made in Brockton and Haverhill, Mass., shoe factories are bought up here and shipped back to children in the Eastern cities.

Western life is grand, even though the East has to furnish it.

AGENCY WON'T DISCUSS FAKED FORD NEWS

N. W. Ayer Charged Preliminary Specifications for New Car Stolen from Office in Telegrams to All American Dailies

After charging an unnamed news agency with theft of "preliminary and experimental" specifications of the new Ford car issued as authentic news, N. W. Ayer & Son, Philadelphia advertising agency this week declined to discuss the affair when information was sought by EDITOR & PUBLISHER.

The accusation was made last week by N. W. Ayer & Son in a 100-word paid telegram sent out to all newspapers in the United States and Canada. The newspapers were asked not to publish the news agency's story which was described as "fictitious and imaginative."

The text of the telegram follows:

"N. W. Ayer & Son, advertising counsel for Ford Motor Company, advise you that a theft has taken place from their offices in Philadelphia of certain preliminary and experimental advertisements in regard to the new Ford car. Material used therein which in many particulars is fictitious and imaginative has been issued as authentic news by a news agency. N. W. Ayer & Son state that the car is not complete, therefore any alleged specifications have no warrant of truth. We hope no newspaper will publish these stories. This wire is sent to all newspapers in the United States and Canada.

"N. W. AYER & SON."

EDITOR & PUBLISHER was informed this week that the story referred to by N. W. Ayer & Son was not carried by any of the five national news agencies, Associated Press, United Press, International News Service, Universal Service or Consolidated Press, but was obtained and issued by a New York financial ticker service.

Mr. Hawkins has been succeeded as general business director by William G. Chandler, formerly manager of the central group of Scripps-Howard Newspapers. George B. Parker, formerly general editorial executive, has been made editor-in-chief of the Scripps-Howard Newspapers.

said they were necessitated by the recent rapid expansion of the organization and the concomitant increase in executive work.

"In his former position," Mr. Howard said, "Mr. Hawkins was interested only in the business side of the organization. Under the new arrangement, he will have authority in editorial as well as business matters the same as I have."

Ray A. Huber, business manager of the Cleveland Press, was appointed by Mr. Howard to assistant general business manager of all Scripps-Howard newspapers and John Meilink, advertising manager of the Cleveland Press, was promoted to the business managership of that newspaper.

Mr. Hawkins this week left New York on a business trip to the Pacific Coast. Mr. Howard is planning to leave next Wednesday on a trip to the southern newspapers of the group. He will go to Knoxville first, later visiting Memphis, Houston and El Paso.

"BRIBE" RUMOR FACTORY BUSY IN SPORTDOM

Madison Square Garden "Entertainment Fund" Said to Be $65,000—N. Y. Graphic "Exposes" $200 "Loan Payment"—Ballyhoo Begins for Dempsey Comeback

By PHILIP SCHUYLER

WITH the Dempsey-Sharkey heavyweight fight set for July 21 and a Dempsey-Tunney match to follow, the air n New York sport circles was heavy his week with rumors of attempted bribery" of writers and the usual acounts of an elaborate pay-off system at he Madison Square Garden.

Tex Rickard, king of the promoters, vas quoted in reliable quarters as saying hat the "entertainment of newspaper nen" was costing him more than $65,000 year. This sum, it was said, was exended chiefly for liquid refreshments, vearing apparel and other gifts to newsaper men to keep them happy, friendly nd insure publicity on sports pages.

Mr. Rickard was in seclusion at his ffice preparing "for the big show" and fforts by EDITOR & PUBLISHER to see im and confirm the remarks attributed o him were unavailing.

A prize fighter was also "exposed" this veek by New York Evening Graphic, vhich published on June 27 a facsimile f a check for $200, the signature of vhich was obliterated by the tabloid. his check, the Graphic alleged, was sent o its boxing writer, James Jennings.

EDITOR & PUBLISHER was shown the heck and the accompanying letter. The etter mentioned payment of a loan, which ennings denied ever having made to the rize fighter. The check has been reurned uncashed.

The letter follows:

"Dear Jim: Inclosed, please find check or $200 in payment of the loan made ie during my last visit to New York.

"It was very generous of you to adance me this when I was in a precarious osition, due to my inability to cash a neck.

"I want to take this occasion to thank ou for this kind act, and at the same me express my appreciation for the olendid assistance you have given me ght along."

As played by the Graphic, the check cident appeared like a common "pay ff" practice. Sports editors and writers n other papers promptly asserted they ever heard of such procedure.

Some, in conversations with the writer, ter declaring emphatically they had ver seen any money passed themselves, dmitted that they had heard of "gifts" newspaper men of orders at well nown haberdasheries, and had also heard "cash being slipped into the overcoat ckets of sports writers." Another ethod, which the sports writers had ard was practiced, was described as llows:

"A reporter, eating at a restaurant, the ng-out of promoters and fighters, ould receive word from a waiter that was wanted on the telephone. On tering the booth, he would see a roll bills protruding from the return coin ot. He never knew nor cared who put em there."

The biggest names in the sports writg world are never coupled with such ady operations. The insinuation is offed at. Talk to these men, and they ll say themselves that such stories are aginative, or else, that "used to be the se, but is no more."

New York sports editors do not admit at anything like the rumors suggested ur in actuality and are confident of professional integrity of their own ffs. One did, this week, admit a genus streak in Gene Tunney. The presheavyweight champion, Paul Gallico, orts editor of the New York Daily ews said, gave one of his staff writers watch. "But they were pals," he said, nd I let my reporter keep the watch."

Whether in response to generosity or , the Dempsey ballyhoo has started, using public interest in his "comeck."

W. O. McGeehan, sports editor of the w York Herald Tribune, wrote this week: "The effects of the long sustained ballyhoo for the return of Jack Dempsey are beginning to be felt. Mr. Tex Rickard reports that the advance sale is more than he anticipated even in his most optimistic moods. Already the Six Hundred Millionaires of Madison Square Garden have made applications for the choice acreage of the Yankee Stadium.

"Mr. Dempsey is established at Luther's place at Saratoga and the experts are beginning to gather there. It will be some few days before Mr. Dempsey starts to go through the usual training evolutions which will permit the experts to peer at him with the customary expertness. As to the state of Mr. Dempsey's health, the ex-heavyweight champion reports it to be excellent. He made the same report immediately prior to the Battle of the Sesquicentennial.

"It looks as though there will be the same long period of experting prior to his bout with Jack Sharkey that there was before the Battle of the Sesquicentennial. Several hundred experts peered at Mr. Dempsey for days and concluded that there was absolutely nothing the matter with him. After the bout with Tunney, however, it seemed that everything was."

SPORTS REPORTING WAS A SCHOLARLY OCCUPATION FIFTY YEARS AGO

Discourse on Merits of Athletics Usually Preceded News of Who Won—Several Stories Often Lumped Together —Occupied Small Space in Newspapers

By LESTER JORDAN

NEWSPAPERS of 50 years ago and today differ greatly in many respects but in no phase of journalism is the change more apparent than in the sports section. Fifty years ago sports news played an insignificant part in newspaper making. Today the sports section is a determining factor in the success or failure of any daily paper. Given little attention half a century ago, sports events are now overplayed. As one writer said: "The popular press frankly makes sports its leading feature, and the more serious newspapers avowedly imitate their too successful competitors."

The change that has taken place in the handling of sports news is shown most clearly in the amount of space devoted to athletic events. Occasionally reports of horse races and the infrequent baseball games constituted most of the sports news just after the Civil War. At that time many metropolitan papers would print no sports news for weeks at a time. Few local sporting contests were held and news of that type could not compete with political articles for space devoted to national news. An examination of newspapers of 1875 showed that only 1.7 per cent of the news space was devoted to sports. Business, legal, personal, crime, political and foreign news each occupied more space than sports news.

Newspapers in 1875 printed less than half a column of sports news daily. Today the average metropolitan daily has three or four pages of sports daily and from six to twelve on Sunday. The percentage has increased from 1.7 to an average of more than one-fifth of the total news space. In most papers more columns are occupied by sports than by any other type of news. While 50 years ago sports news appeared only occasionally, today it is the least variable of all types of news. The main reason for this change is that sports news today does not have to conform to a certain news value standard to be printed. The papers have a certain amount of space that is to be filled by sports regardless of the news value of the stories. If sports stories had to meet the same tests as general news articles considerably less space would be occupied by the sporting section.

The growth of sports is the principal cause for the increased newspaper space given over to reports of athletic events, but the general use of the advance story also has been a determining factor in the gain in space. In the period before and immediately following the Civil War editors saw little news value in a sports story until the event had taken place. Many important baseball games would be played without receiving any attention from the newspapers until the day after the contest was held. Contrast this with the present policy of the papers which ballyhoo an event for weeks in advance. Today more columns are filled preceding an event than following it.

A study of the sporting news of a half century reflects many marked changes in the technique of newspaper reporting. The following lead, taken from a copy of the Chicago Tribune of 1867, is a typical story of that period. Imagine the joy a copy reader would derive from "butchering" it today.

"The match game of baseball between the O. K. Club, of Ottawa, and the Atlantics, of this city, was played yesterday on the grounds of the latter club, at the foot of Ontario street. The day was very hot, although a gentle breeze now and then came from the lake, and fanned, with a delightful coolness, the overheated players and spectators.

"The O. K.'s have been an organization only since last April, and for so young a club play a very good game. This is the third match game played, and in each instance defeat came to them with great odds in favor of the victors. Their uniforms are black cloth pants, white shirts, red leather belts, and white jockey caps with red buttons on the crowns."

The reader did not find out the result or the score until he came to the box score at the end of the story. At that time many baseball games would start with a scholarly discourse on the advantages of the sport as the only game fit for the ladies to see, with the important facts of the game itself appearing only in the final few paragraphs, if at all. It was not unusual for a report of a college athletic event to start with a philosophical dissertation on the development of athletics in universities and the increasing attention being paid to the physical well-being of the student, followed by a review of games played in previous years by the two contesting teams. At the conclusion of the discussion of these topics the reporter would tell who won.

Much criticism is hurled at the sports section today for the generous use of slang, but an examination of papers of 35 and 40 years ago shows that present sports writers are no more guilty than their predecessors in this respect. But the slang has changed and it is difficult to understand many of the terms used at an earlier period.

What a protest would be made today if all local stories on the sports pages were written as one article, without even a dash separating the different items. That was the way the metropolitan papers handled sports events many years ago. Reports of baseball games, horse races, pedestrian tournaments, and billiard matches were combined into one article. One deck in the headline for each of the major sports was the rule, but the headlines differed greatly from those of today. Now the copy reader will give the result and the score as well as other important facts in the headline. Then the headlines were little more than labels, as is shown by the following decks of a headline that is typical of the period: "Sporting; Exciting Running Race at the Brighton Course; The Opening of the Dexter Park; Base Ball Match Between the O. K. Club of Ottawa, and the Atlantics; Western Trip of the National Club; The State Convention."

Without the assistance of the newspapers sports would never have attained their present popularity. Sports officials are among the first to admit the debt that baseball, football, boxing and other sports owe to the papers. But few critics of the press would assert that the papers have been the only factor in the growing popularity of sports. No amount of space in the paper could have increased the attendance at the Army-Navy game from the 100 who saw the first game between the two institutions in 1890 to the 111,000 fans that saw the two service teams in their game at Chicago last November. Greater rapidity of transportation and communication, growth of cities, increase and greater distribution of wealth, increase of leisure, growth of tradition about certain events, and the inherent appeal in sports have been determining factors in the increased popularity of sports.

Football and other sports in their early years were given little attention by the metropolitan papers. It was several years after the Eastern universities began playing football that reports of the games appeared in the New York papers. While the papers have fostered the interest in sports, they were of little assistance to the organizers of the various games until after the sport had established itself among a certain class of the people.

Present day opinion of sports promoters, newspaper editors, psychologists, trade publication editors, advertising men, and journalism instructors is that sports on their present scale would be impossible without the sports section of the daily papers. One director of athletics at a large university estimated that the papers were responsible for 50 per cent of the crowd at any game. Stadiums could not be paid for, and college athletics would be a financial failure without the aid of the sporting pages, the athletic director said.

Sports pages undoubtedly exert a great influence upon the readers and upon the sports, but an examination of papers for the last 75 years shows that most of the protests against existing evils have appeared either in the editorial columns or in the general news section, rather than on the sports pages. The press led the fight for changes in football as it was played before 1906, but the attacks on the brutality of the game as then played were not printed in the sports section.

The modern news summary lead also began to be used about 1890. Before that time the reports usually were written in chronological order. Definite statements in the headlines of sports articles also came into general use in that decade. Sports spectacles were given more space at that time than they are today.

QUESTIONNAIRE REVEALS HOW PAPERS MEET TRANSPORTATION PROBLEMS

Ninety-Seven Newspapers Operating 691 Motor Routes Covering 60,000 Miles Daily, Survey Shows—Cost Is Set at $53.65 Per Week Per Truck—5 2/3 Cents a Mile

By G. S. GALLOWAY
Circulation Manager, Rockford (Ill.) Register-Gazette

Following is the complete text of a report entitled "Reaching Out By Motor Routes," submitted by Mr. Galloway at the meeting last week of the International Circulation Managers' Association in Atlanta.

WITH the increasing popularity of the automobile, the building of good roads at the rate of 35,000 miles per year, affecting the continuous curtailment of suburban railroad service, the newspapers have been confronted with the greatest transportation problem in their history, and this condition will increase many fold.

In order for a newspaper to keep its present suburban circulation and serve its territory under these conditions, it must turn to the only practical solution of the present day—that of motorizing its field.

In handling this topic, I wanted to make a thorough investigation among the members of this organization and sent out 485 questionnaires, and received 130 replies.

In analyzing these answers, I found there were 41 newspapers that were not using auto service in their suburban and country territory. Forty-nine evening newspapers maintain 249 routes covering 16,000 miles a day, or an average of 65 miles per route at an average cost of four and a half cents per mile. Thirty-two of these report a circulation increase of from 5 per cent to 200 per cent or an average of 35 per cent during the past year. Thirty-seven morning newspapers maintain 238 routes, covering 19,177 miles daily, or an average of 80.6 miles per route, at an average cost of 5.7¢ per mile. Thirteen morning papers report an increase in circulation from 1 per cent to 83 per cent or an average increase of 22 per cent. Eleven newspapers having thirteen issues a week had a total of 204 routes covering 13,000 miles, averaging 63.3 miles each.

In summary, 97 newspapers were operating 691 motor routes covering more than 60,000 miles per day, or greater than twice the distance around the globe. The average cost of operation per mile given above does not represent the total expense of operation, as I find that 33 per cent of the above report that they wholesale their single delivery papers to the drivers who make a profit on each subscriber.

There are several different cost plans in use, and I have classified them under three headings:

First, "Office Owned Trucks."

Twenty-five per cent of the newspapers reporting operate their own trucks, paying their drivers a flat salary and paying all up-keep on the trucks. The most complete report of the cost of operation under this system is from a paper using six trucks covering 953 miles per day, which analyzed costs as follows:

Salary, $26.25; gas and oil, $11.30; Repairs, Insurance and Tires, $16.10; Total, $53.65 per truck per week, or 5-2-3¢ per mile. These figures do not include the original investment in equipment or depreciation.

Second, "Privately Owned Cars."

Ten per cent of the newspapers reported are operating on a small salary and wholesale papers for individual subscribers through the drivers. (Two papers report that they wholesale their entire circulation to the drivers, including agents and make them responsible for maintaining circulation and collections.)

It is impossible to average the cost on this classification.

Third, "Operation Under Contract Plan."

Sixty-five per cent of the papers reported are operating under the contract plan, paying a flat rate per mile at a cost of approximately nine cents a mile. Very few of the papers operating under this plan have taken advantage of the individual farm delivery.

Fifty per cent of the papers report a farm delivery service of which we find 44 per cent wholesale these papers to their drivers who make all collections. Twenty-six per cent use special solicitors only, and 30 per cent collect partly by mail and solicitors. Ninety per cent of all solicitation for new subscriptions is done by special solicitors.

A number of the larger newspapers have found that they have been able to maintain automobile routes throughout their territory at a cost less than the express or baggage rate of the railroads, due to the heavy tonnage on these routes.

I am now going to quote a few paragraphs from letters received from circulation managers in various states.

A Southern member reports: "Most of our truck routes are operated by independent drivers. These drivers furnish their own equipment and receive a weekly salary figured on the basis of the poundage handled, and in most every instance we get these papers handled cheaper than if they were sent by baggage or express.

"Our express rate is $1 per 100 pounds and baggage 90¢ per 100 pounds where it is handled by the same company. If handled by two express companies we pay $2 per hundred. These drivers handle mostly dealer packages, but where we have no train service to get the individual mail subscribers' papers to destination in time to go out on the rural routes the same day as published, they haul these for us also."

A Middle Western paper reports "We have motor routes on our three pa pers, figuring on the tonnage basis co us $11.59 per 1,000 pounds during 1926.

Another paper reports: "The moto truck delivery is secure. It is here t stay and will be enlarged upon as fas as the country builds good roads."

A Western member reports his pape has four motor routes which carry agents bundles to nearby towns and to carrier who serve rural subscribers using eithe a horse or bicycle. These boys cove approximately eight miles per day at a average cost of $1.50 per month per mile The average cost of our motor trucks i $3.00 per mile per month.

The carrier boys must keep up thei subscription list just the same as th city carrier boys. They make their own collections and are allowed 10 per cen on same. They are also paid the usua new order commission on new subscrip tions.

In conclusion I want to say that I am a firm believer in the auto delivery service and am of the opinion that any newspaper situated in a territory where it has good roads can increase its circulation and at the same time extend its territory at a reasonable cost providing there is sufficient population in said territory.

NEW OFFICERS TAKE CHARGE OF I. C. M. A.

AN exciting contest for the office of second vice-president marked the closing session of the International Circulation Managers Association at Atlanta last week.

H. W. Stodghill

H. W. Stodghill, Louisville Courier - Journal was elected to this important office after a number of ballots, upsetting the predictions which had figured James A. Mathews, St. Paul Pioneer-Press, would win. The election places Mr. Stodghill in line for presidency of the group in 1929.

Harold Hough, Fort Worth Star-Telegram, was elected president, succeeding Charles Payne, Indianapolis Star, who completed one of the most successful terms in the organization's history. An error in telegraphic transmission placed Mr. Payne on both the Star and Times in last week's Editor & Publisher.

J. M. Annenberg, Curtis-Martin Newspapers, was elected first vice-president, and, according to tradition, will be I. C. M. A. president in 1928. Clarence Eyster, Peoria Star, was re-elected secretary-treasurer.

In the second vice-president's contest votes were cast for Thomas Dowling, Scripps-Howard Newspapers and John N. Eisenlord, Chicago Daily News.

HARN DESCRIBES CIRCULATORS' MEET AS "PROFITABLE AND BALANCED"

Director of A. B. C. Impressed with Broad-Mindedness of Newspaper Circulation Managers—Says Sales Campaigns Being Judged by Effect on Sound Economics

By O. C. HARN
Managing Director, Audit Bureau of Circulations

Editor & Publisher asked Mr. Harn for an expression of his opinion on the value to members of the convention of the International Circulation Managers' Association held in Atlanta last week. His article, written in reply, follows.

THIS has been my first I. C. M. A. convention and naturally my first inclination is to compare it with other conventions I have attended. Conventions fall into two classes, working conventions and golfing conventions. The I.C.M.A. is in the former class. The men attended the business meetings. They took part in the discussions.

My second impression is that while there were prepared papers on each subject on the program, these were by no means the whole program. They were more in the nature of starters of the discussion. No sooner were they concluded than several members were demanding the floor and a heated discussion followed. This always makes for lively interest. More profit comes from these debates than from routine speeches because it is only in this way that all the ideas can be brought out. A convention is not worth the time and money spent on it unless the delegates carry back home ideas which can be harnessed and put to work. The full notebook is the test.

My third impression is that the circulation manager of today is a much broader individual than he used to be. This was evident in all the discussions. There semed to be a full consciousness on the part of the members of the role that circulation building plays in the complete business of making a newspaper. In other words, every sales plan was considered and judged by its effect on sound economics. Opinions differed, of course, on the various questions which arose, but all the speakers seemed to realize that their views were futile unless they could stand the all-around test.

Finally, I was impressed with the fact a great many members of I.C.M.A. were short-sighted. These were the members who were not present. Not half the enrolled members were in Atlanta. If the stay-aways really could see the fat, well-filled memorandum books which were carried out of Atlanta, I feel sure that they would realize that they had lost money by not making the journey to the meeting. I can't conceive of any more profitable annual investment that the circulation department could make than that in a railroad ticket to an I.C.M.A. convention, if they are all like this, my first.

Unless anyone should get the idea from what I have written that the convention was all work and no play, I should say that there were plenty of delightful social features, a very valuable factor in business meetings. But they were kept in their proper place. The balance between work and play was admirable.

$1,650,000 IN BONDS SOLD BY OHIO GROUP

Brush-Moore Newspapers Dispose of Large Issue Through Cleveland and New York Financial Houses

The Brush-Moore Newspapers, Inc., a corporation formed under Ohio laws a few days ago, to take over the five properties controlled by the syndicate, have sold $1,650,000 ten-year collateral trust 6½ per cent sinking fund gold bonds through Cleveland and New York financial houses.

The new corporation has an authorized capital of $1,400,000. Louis Brush is president.

Mr. Brush in a statement to the public in connection with the gold note offerings said that the combined value of the newspaper properties is around $4,000,000.

The properties included are the Repository Printing Company, publishing the Canton Repository evening and Sunday editions; the Harding Publishing Company, publishing the Marion Star; the Salem Publishing Company, owning the Salem News; the East Liverpool Publishing Company, publishing the East Liverpool Tribune-Review; the Herald Printing Company, owning the Steubenville Herald-Star.

Net earnings of the properties, after depreciation and before interest and federal income taxes were paid, in 1923, were $184,420, and these jumped to $418,233 in 1926.

For the four years ending December 31, 1926, Mr. Brush said the subsidiary companies paid cash dividends in excess of $700,000.

The proceeds of the gold note sale will be used to reimburse the company for the cost of the Canton Repository Printing Company, recently acquired by the Brush-Moore people.

BROUGHT COOLIDGE TO S. D.

Editor of Hot Springs Star Started Movement by Telegram March 30

Francis H. Case, editor of the Hot Springs (S. D.) Star weekly, is credited with bringing President Coolidge to the Black Hills for his summer vacation.

It was Editor Case, who on March 30, first broached the idea of inviting President Coolidge to the Black Hills in a telegram sent to Congressman Williamson urging that an invitation be extended the President. Mr. Case was impelled to send the message when press dispatches told that the President would not return to Swampscott this summer.

BOND HOUSES OVERLOOKING VALUE OF NEWSPAPER ADVERTISING

Copy Technique "Fishy-Eyed" Speaker Tells Financial Advertisers at Denver—Dailies Needed to Develop Vast Potential Field

Following, in part, is an address delivered by Paul Loughridge, Bosworth, Chanute, Loughridge & Co., Denver, before the Financial Advertisers Association departmental meeting at the Denver Convention of the International Advertising Association this week.

THERE is nothing novel in financial houses advertising in the newspapers. But there is hesitancy on the part of many—perhaps the majority—of bond houses to take full advantage of the tremendous possibilities for good that lie in the more vigorous and diversified use of newspaper space. When I speak of possibilities for good, I am referring not only to the good that results to the bond house, but to the general investing public as well.

The efforts of a bond house to merchandise its securities are threefold, all closely linked together; first, through salesmen; second, through direct mail circularization; and third, through newspaper advertising. Every bond house has its list of addressograph plates to which a regular monthly circular is sent. Month after month these circulars go out to the same list of comparatively few people. If you will but compare the number of people on your list to the immense number of people living in your territory, you will realize how really puny is your effort to reach out and make bond buyers of the masses. If you figure out the number of calls made each day by your salesmen, you will be astonished to see how few people you really try to sell. It really is pitifully small. I'll venture to say that there are not over eight to ten thousand names on any one list in a Denver bond house, and yet within selling distance of Denver, there are at least 3,000,000 people. There is but one medium which will bring your message to all and that is the daily newspaper. Yet bond houses, as a rule, have not yet awakened to this fact. They do not see the immense possibilities which lie under their very eyes.

The creation of an advertising policy must be based directly on the ideals of the bond house. This sounds commonplace, but it is interesting to note that when the head of a bond house is aggressive, alert, and anxious to create a constructive selling policy, a similar constructive advertising policy usually results.

Since the war, most investment bankers have been occupied with the task of finding securities to absorb the flood of money. Their advertising has been a purely formal gesture, frequently accompanied by the salutation: "This advertisement appears as a matter of record only."

All this is well enough today, but what of the future? I'm no prophet, but it will be surprising if the coming years don't change the situation greatly, with a competition for business that will make that of today seem like a love-feast.

Then the heads of the bond houses will be forced to turn to advertising as a tool to develop new markets, to reach greater numbers of possible clients, and to turn into desirable customers the great unschooled body of potential investors who now think of a bond house only as a place where men read the Wall Street Journal and have oriental rugs in their private offices. Yet the most casual observer can see that fully 85 per cent of the newspaper space devoted to financial advertising by reputable bond houses is still confined to the fishy-eyed formal advertisement which introduces itself in a dead voice with these sacred words: "As syndicate members, we offer....."

There are many notable exceptions, but in general, there seems to be little attempt made to interest anybody except experienced investors in the service and merchandise of a bond house. The advertising is void of inspiration, highly technical, and as cordial as a man being touched for a loan of $50.

You are probably familiar with the analysis published in the American Bankers' Association Journal by J. S. McCoy of the United States Treasury Department, in which he estimates that the total number of security holders in the United States is only 3,000,000.

I venture to say that most of the 3,000,000 are now experienced investors and that the formal security advertisement and bond circular meets all of their requirements.

But the undeveloped market—with its millions of potential bond buyers, is the one that should interest most every bond man who has an eye to the future, and there is almost a total lack in our newspapers, of the type of advertising which will influence this great market to invest its money in anything except radios, automobiles, fake oil stocks, etc. We shake our head sadly over the billion or so that is dumped into worthless securities every year, but what competition to the fakes do we legitimate investment bankers offer. We have the most fascinating story in the world to tell these people. We can make it even more alluring than that of the faker, because the public is always a bit uncertain about the faker even while it is sending him its money. We have the medium at hand to tell our story—the newspapers. We have the men ready to write the story—eager to write it. But with a few notable exceptions, the story is never told. So the Bonanza Gold Mines promoter, and the Wild Cat Oil Wallingford, find the field wide open with no competition in sight.

The only way that the development of this potential market can be speeded up is for the investment houses of the country to do vastly more educational and inspirational work in newspaper advertising. It happens that our firm has enjoyed all sorts of experiences in trying to put some of these ideas into practice. If I refer to our own work too much, I apologize, but it is only natural that I should talk about what we have learned from experience.

In the use of newspaper advertising, we maintain a very flexible policy, although working on an annual budget. We use it to reach all classes of investors—the large, experienced investor, the inexperienced investor, and the person who has never bought a bond. We even advertise $100 bonds occasionally to show the small investor that we welcome him, just as a means of keeping the door open for everybody who has or ever will have money to invest.

We are guided in newspaper advertising by the following five principles:

1. The Prestige of the Firm Must be Continually Impressed.—We plan to advertise in the newspapers every day. Daily hammering away over the firm name for years, backed by sincerity on the part of the advertiser, inevitably builds prestige.

2. Formal Announcement of Issues. There is no quarrel with this phase of newspaper advertising. It is the most convenient method of conveying information to experienced investors concerning any new bond issue, enabling salesmen to call their clients on the phone and tell them to look in the newspaper for a description of the issue. There is a distinct place for this type of advertising.

3. Educational Advertising for the New or Inexperienced Investor.—This educational process is not an overnight thing and it covers a vast field. Expenditure of a part of the firm's advertising appropriation for this kind of advertising may be likened to an industrial concern putting a portion of its earnings into brick and mortar instead of dividends. It doesn't bring immediate profits, but it builds wisely for the future.

4. The Advertisement of Single Issues or Odd Lots for Direct Sale.—Here is an opportunity for a complete breaking away from the stereotyped forms.

5. Providing the Incentive to Buy Bonds.—This is a field in which there is the greatest opportunity for newspaper advertising. The average buyer buys bonds for a purpose. People with money who don't buy bonds, won't buy them unless they are given the inspiration of a purpose. They must have a picture painted for them which shows conclusively what bond buying will do for them.

Every city is full of people eagerly seeking a sure and safe way of saving money and becoming independent in their old age. If they make a billion dollars worth of mistakes every year, in their effort to accumulate, are they to blame or are the investment bankers of the country? We know that they will respond if an attractive light is thrown on bond investment. We can tell as fascinating a story, without exaggeration, as ever inspired a man to invest in mines and oil wells. And there are enough investment bankers in the United States to educate and inspire such huge numbers of potential investors that a new market second only in size to that of the Liberty Loans, could be developed if we would all concentrate on educational and inspirational newspaper advertising.

Undoubtedly, the time is coming when newspaper advertising will be in general use as a means of selling ideas as well as issues of selling the whole market—the undeveloped portion as well as that which now makes up the bond business. Then more newspaper space will be used, some real competition for the faker and fly-by-night promoter will be provided, and we will have more readable and more widely effective copy.

"IN most cases, ninety per cent or more of the merchandise advertised at a 'special sale' price is marked as high as—and in many cases higher than—the regular price ought to be. What is the result? Dissatisfaction among customers; shattered confidence; suspicion in the minds of newspaper readers when a bona-fide offer is made in an advertisement. Then follows mistrust, a loss of faith and a feeling of unbelief and uncertainty. The influence and force of advertising in general is materially reduced. The newspaper suffers. Newspaper publishers can do a constructive job in situations of this kind, if they wish. A newspaper is primarily a news medium, and if a store's advertisement does not present an instructive and constructive news message, it has no place in a newspaper."—R. L. WHITMAN, Advertising Director, J. C. Penney Company, New York.

"The past year has been marked by progress and the unusual in community advertising attracting the attention of the entire world—one city after another has fallen into line—large communities, metropolitan districts, states and groups of states have found community advertising valuable. My estimate is that anywhere from seven to eight million dollars is being spent annually now for Community Advertising.—C. F. HATFIELD, St. Louis, president, American Community Advertising Association.

"THERE lies before advertising and advertising men not only the opportunity for service and profit but the clear call to duty. There rests upon business and industrial leaders of the world the distinct responsibility to state and explain the facts and principles upon which national and international business progress must be built so clearly that the oft-quoted man in the street, may understand. A large and constantly increasing reading public seeks eagerly to know, and it is the mission of the publicist to inform and advise them through all the mediums at his command."—FRANCIS S. The contest, staged annually by the promotion department of the Scripps-Howard Newspapers, drew scores of freckle-faced boys to the famous New Jersey resort this week from many cities of the west, south and middle west.

When In Detroit Do as Detroiters Do

Crowd of Purchasers Waiting to Enter Owen & Co.'s Furniture Store, Detroit, After a Double Truck Advertisement Used Exclusively in The News.

The graph above portrays the relative use of space by local merchants in the two Detroit evening newspapers. It clearly demostrates how far superior in advertising effectiveness The Detroit News is considered to be by the local merchants.

Those on the ground—the Detroit merchants—whose daily contact with Detroit people is direct and whose advertising effectiveness is immediately tabulated by the surest index yet known—the cash register—continually prefer The Detroit News and use increasingly more space in its columns.

In 1921 The Detroit News led the then second evening newspaper by 110%. In 1926, however, The Detroit News carried 1,185,400 inches of local merchants' advertising or 158% more than the present second evening paper did, thus showing not only remarkable leadership but a great increase in leadership.

This increased concentration in The Detroit News is significant of the greater value inherent in HOME circulation. In this respect The Detroit News is in a class by itself.

Detroit merchants are themselves readers of The News and are well aware of the influence The Detroit News has in the home circle. An instance of this may be seen in the fact that more than 300,000 letters were received in 1926 by various editorial departments of The News from householders, seeking advice on fashions, decoration, health, beauty, domestic economy and other topics.

In its own home town The Detroit News is the preferred medium and it is reasonable to assume that the newspaper so preferred by merchants is the newspaper that will bring the best results for manufacturers, as well.

PRACTICE OF BARRING FREE PASSES GROWING

"Journalism Should Be Free from Mendicancy" One Daily Replies to Strauss Questionnaire—Othe Restrict Passes to Reporters Actually Covering an Event

A TENDENCY among newspapers to refuse free pass privileges from theatrical enterprises is noted in a survey made by Moses Strauss, managing editor of the Cincinnati Times-Star, to obtain material for an address he delivered recently before the Associated Press editors of Ohio.

One of the shortest replies to Mr. Strauss' questions came from a Milwaukee newspaper. It was:

"We think journalism should be free from mendicancy."

Another laconic answer came from Denver, reading: "We buy our tickets. They pay for their advertising."

Mr. Strauss has made public replies he received from newspapers in 18 cities. Of the total eight accept no passes and two allow the Annie Oakleys to critics only.

Some of the newspaper replies follow:

BALTIMORE—Accepts passes generally. The old convention of accepting these passes has never been abandoned as a whole, although, in the case of individual theaters, whose managers seem to feel that acceptance of passes implies an obligation to the theaters, passes are promptly declined. There have been two such cases within my recollection. The performances at these theatres were, of course, reviewed precisely as in the past, and although the managements were assured that reviews would be continued without prejudice, whether or not passes were granted, the managers in both cases asked that they be allowed to resume supplying passes. There is a great deal to be said against the acceptance of passes under any condition. It would be intolerable to have news treatment of the theatres governed or influenced in the slightest measure by acceptance or nonacceptance, and if I felt that this was even a possible result, I would terminate our arrangement immediately. I do not, however, feel that there is any threat of such a situation. I would only add that the staff is prohibited from accepting personal courtesies from the theatres. I mean by this that the only passes accepted are those which come through the city editor and are distributed by him to individual members of the staff.

DETROIT—For critics only.

CLEVELAND—Accepts no passes to any amusement event that has a paid gate, except for working reporters and photographers. Any employe who accepts a pass lays himself liable to discharge. We took this action for two reasons: First, because we felt that the newspaper had outgrown the old exchange of courtesies principle which existed when newspaper editors and "ham" actors were both in the same boat as far as financial responsibility was concerned, and, second, because we did not care to obligate this paper to anybody, and we felt that there was an implied obligation in accepting passes.

MINNEAPOLIS—Accept passes, Passes to commercial amusement affairs are one of the last remmants of the old days. I would like to see them done away with.

BOSTON—Do not accept so-called newspaper passes. We have passes to baseball games, circuses, theaters and various fairs and expositions, but make it a rule that they are used only by employes and their families.

BUFFALO, N. Y.—Accept passes. They are given in consideration of theatrical notices in our Saturday paper. The critic is in no way hampered. We are independent of the theatres and last year offered to cut out passes entirely.

DENVER—We buy our tickets. They pay for their advertising.

PHILADELPHIA—We accept no courtesies except field badges at sporting events and other credentials that may not properly be classed as "passes." We subscribe to all testimonial dinners which we intend to cover on a news basis and we buy tickets for all shows we intend to review. We charge full rates for all theatrical and sporting advertising and reserve the right to say what we like about all concerned. None employed in the establishment is permitted to render any service to any other publication or to accept outside work of any kind—press agency, etc. Our reporters are never the step-children of any affair. They are compelled to pay their way and maintain the dignity of the publication in every situation. This is impossible with "passes."

NEW YORK CITY—Accepts passes, but does not solicit them. Baseball passes are received by the working baseball writers and some of the heads of the departments. The same is true of racing passes. In addition to the passes used by the writers of prizefighting, a half dozen tickets are sent to the sports editor. Two tickets are sent by the theaters to the dramatic critic and to the dramatic editor. The music critic receives two passes. The acceptance of a ticket entails no obligation on the part of the recipient. Those who have tickets as distinct from working passes are guests of the management.

PHILADELPHIA—Two tickets are furnished to the dramatic editor for the opening performance, and the acceptance of "passes" under our rules stops there.

LOS ANGELES—Critic passes accepted with the understanding that no obligation is implied. Additionally two passes a week are accepted, but requests for additional seats are avoided when "sell-outs" are presented.

PALM BEACH—No passes accepted. They constitute a petty "bribe." They cause costly friction in the office. The giver expects many times their value. No one can accept a pass and retain his dignity. A newspaper is a greater institution than any pass-giving concern and should not be belittled by being offered such petty sophistry.

NEW YORK—We do not countenance the accepting of passes for anything except for us in obtaining material for publication. We prefer to be under no obligation to anyone or any institution.

INDIANAPOLIS—Have accepted passes for many years. Do not know when the custom was instituted. These passes are used by employes. I have never found that any harm has come from this practice and neither do I know any advantage being gained by this practice other than the saving of money that would be spent for tickets. Dinner tickets are usually accepted, as they are sent in the hope that the engagement will be covered by a staff member.

ALBANY (P. M.)—Critic, for the first performance only. Such passes as may be in possession of members of our staff have been given them as individuals only.

NEW ORLEANS (A. M.)—Accept passes generally. I presume that these are taken on the theory that these forms of relaxation are entitled to news recognition, but do so little advertising that we should get as much as possible out of them in the way of passes for employes. We accept two passes from theaters for the use of our reviewer at opening performances only and none thereafter. Many years ago any of our employes desiring to attend a show had no difficulty in obtaining passes, but the practice was greatly abused and the management made a rule that no theater passes would be accepted except for the critic to attend the first showing. Our employees understand that they will be dismissed if found soliciting or accepting theater passes other than as stated. The use of passes for various sporting events is an endless source of bickering and annoyance, so much so that the distribution has been placed in the business office, where, in order to avoid favoritism, a record is made of all passes given out. I believe it would be a good thing for newspapers generally if passes were taboo except for the use of writers specifically assigned to cover the event.

CHICAGO (P. M.)—We accept a limited number of passes. We do this only in harmony with custom. We do not accept privileges from people who we know will abuse such a relationship.

I never ask for a theater pass and accept only when thrust upon me by persons who I know make the offer out of pure good feeling and whom I do not like to offend. Papers have been known to grab two whole rows at an opening.

KANSAS CITY—The practice of accepting passes was stopped by us fifteen years ago. There were two reasons: one, that the theaters would do more advertising if they did not have to give away eight or ten seats a night, and the other, the paper would be more independent if it did not accept free seats. I do not know that the advertising has increased any, but the independence of the paper there is no doubt about.

ROCHESTER—We accept passes. We do not feel obligated. No pressure has ever been brought to bear on us that would conflict with fair criticism.

Mr. Strauss also obtained the opinions of some theatrical managers of the subject and has quoted them anonymously.

One Chicago manager wrote that he knew of no reason why a theatre should issue tickets to a newspaper or its employes.

"Our theatre has discontinued all advertising that requires the issuing of free tickets, whether newspapers, posters or window cards," he wrote. "We pay a high rate for our advertising and, while we may get more or less publicity through the dramatic columns of the press for which we are not rendered a bill, that column is as valuable to the paper and its readers as it is to us.

"Your employes draw a salary commensurate with the work they do and I know of no reason why we should extend courtesies to them. * * * Complimentary tickets have been the curse of the theatre and should be abolished by all theatres just as we have done in ours."

Two other Chicago managers who said they issued passes said they did so for the free publicity they received.

A Hollywood, Cal., manager wrote: "We give 50 passes to eight papers each week. We do this because our publicity department claims that it cannot get the 'readers' and photos placed without them although we carry more than $700 worth of paid ads each week. There seems to be no regulation regarding press passes, as far as I can learn, but there should be."

COMPILING NEWSPAPER LAWS

The "Oklahoma Newspaper Code," a compilation of laws in Oklahoma dealing with the press, is being published by Harlow's Publishing Company of Oklahoma City. This work has been indorsed by the Oklahoma Press Association. It will be fully indexed and divided into three parts, as follows: The Newspaper and The Courts; The Newspaper and Public Business; and Civil and Criminal Responsibility of the Newspaper.

NEWSPAPER IS BEST MEDIUM

Most Profitable Means of Reaching Public Says Utility Man

The newspaper is the best medium for public utility advertising, Fred B. Pitney, advertising manager of the Brooklyn Edison company, declared at the annual meeting of the Empire State Gas and Electric Association at Elmira. He said:

"The public untilities must go to the people with their story, and newspaper advertising is the most profitable means of communicating with the public.

"Newspapers reach our customers and those we desire to make our customers. They reach and are read by all elements of the public which dictates the laws governing our business—this public which we are obliged to serve and satisfy with our service.

"Dollar for dollar spent, I don't believe there is so effective or so low-priced a medium of putting our message before the great body of the people with whom our companies come in contact."

Good Taste in Newspaper Advertising Typography

In order to improve the appearance of its advertising columns, The New York Times in 1922 adopted rules and regulations governing the use of blacks in all advertising announcements. This pioneer effort, now standardized by five years of actual practice, is recognized by local and national advertisers as a significant contribution to the progress of newspaper typography.

Times standards provide typographical protection for intelligently planned advertising, increase productiveness and insure the utmost attractiveness and dignity in newspaper printing.

The third edition of The Times "Manual of Typographical Standards" is a book of the greatest usefulness to all those interested in newspaper advertising production. It explains simply and clearly, with numerous graphic illustrations, the reasons for the adoption of typographical standards, the rules governing various classifications of advertising in The Times and the technical considerations involved in obtaining the best newspaper printing.

The New York Times Manual tells how to submit copy for newspaper reproduction; gives the relative advantages and rules for handling halftones, quartertones, line cuts, wood cuts, Ross board, crayon drawings, cuts and copy; the use of matrices, borders, Ben Day; preparation of copy for rotogravure advertising and gives in addition a wealth of general information of value to those interested in newspaper typography and the mechanics of newspaper advertising.

NEW CONSTITUTION ADOPTED BY PACIFIC ADVERTISING CLUBS AT PORTLAND

"Coast" Dropped From Title Under New Arrangement—900 Attendance Shattered Previous Records—Woman Chosen Vice-President at Large—Newspapers Hosts

By H. E. THOMAS

Portland Correspondent of EDITOR & PUBLISHER

THE Portland convention of the Pacific Coast Advertising Clubs' Association in Portland, Ore., last week was the biggest meeting of advertising men ever held in the West. With more than 900 actual registrations it exceeded previous Southern California. Mr. Stonier was later unanimously chosen as president of the association. "Building the Era of the Pacific Through Advertising," was Mr. Stonier's subject, and he handled it in its broad phases.

Officers elected at annual convention of Pacific Coast Advertising Clubs meeting in Portland, Ore., last week. Left to right: George Montell, Palo Alto, vice-president for Northern California; Richard P. Milne, Seattle, vice-president for Western Washington; William P. Merry, Portland, vice-president for Oregon; Anne P. Keil, Portland, vice-president at large; Harold J. Stonier, Los Angeles, president. Missing from the group are William P. Kelley, Spokane, vice-president for Eastern Washington, and Tom H. Shore, San Diego, vice-president for Southern California.

Pacific Coast conventions in size by a considerable margin and was a larger group than has gathered at times at the national conventions.

A new constitution was adopted by the convention at its closing business session, the outstanding feature of which was a change in name for the organization. The word "coast" was dropped from the title, and it will now be known as the Pacific Advertising Clubs' Association. A resolution was also adopted authorizing the president to investigate the relationship of the coast body to the International Advertising Association, with a view to strengthening the work of the latter organization.

Marshall N. Dana, retiring president of the association, and W. J. Hofmann, general chairman of the convention committee, with their assistants, worked for months to make the Portland gathering an outstanding success. Dana even visited Hawaii and a large delegation from the islands was the result. Incidentally, the choice of Honolulu for the 1928 convention was a popular one and was unanimous. The coast clubs are already discussing the chartering of a steamer to attend the Honolulu meeting and expect it will be one of the most pleasant events in advertising club history.

Not only was the attendance large at Portland, but there was a great amount of real work accomplished. The programs were up to a high standard with many widely known speakers. The one disappointment of the convention was the absence of Senator William E. Borah whose physician ordered him not to speak, as his throat had not sufficiently recovered from a minor operation. Borah had been heralded as the special luminary of the convention.

Borah's place on the program was ably taken by Harold J. Stonier, president of the Los Angeles Advertising Club and vice-president of the University of Don E. Gilman of San Francisco, ex-president of the Pacific Coast association, had some interesting thoughts in the educational section discussion.

"Advertising men," he said, "had better leave the outlining of subjects for an advertising education to the instructors in the colleges who are qualified by experience to determine the basic subjects which will give the student a sound educational basis for his selected life work. Advertising men may contribute by studying these problems in council with the teachers of advertising."

The big entertainment feature of the convention, supplementing dances, dinners and a big stunt show, was Thursday's automobile ride around Mount Hood. This ride includes some 60 miles of the famous Columbia River highway, and then turns off into the Mount Hood loop road, completely circling the mountain and at times being close to the permanent snowline on the side of the peak. At Eagle Creek a trout breakfast was served.

Portland ad men are proud of the fact that Miss Anne Keil, secretary of the Portland club and convention secretary, was chosen vice-president at large, the only time that a woman has ever been given this honor. Miss Keil gets out the Spot Light, the club paper.

The Portland newspapers were hosts for luncheons held each day during the convention. These luncheons were marked by spirited three-minute speaking contests.

Lee R. Doble of Spokane was the winner of the Monday contest. All of the speeches that day were on the subject, "How Can We Best Sell the Community Advertising Idea at Home."

On Tuesday the subject was, "The Influence of Advertising on Modern Life." First honors went to Laurence N. Pease of Stockton.

The concluding speaking contest was on Wednesday, the subject being, "How Can Industry Utilize Advertising to Improve Its Public Relations?" Hal S. Wright of Los Angeles carried off first prize.

Dressing Ads to Fit Their Parts

THE PUBLISHERS of The Distinguished Newspaper have borrowed a bit from Shakespeare. In their opinion, all the newspaper's a stage, and every ad a player seeking to hold the attention of its observers, striving to win belief for the message carried in its lines.

Continuing the analogy, they believe that every advertisement should be dressed to fit its part; first that it might immediately impress beholders with the nature of its role, and again that its attire will be readily recognized in subsequent appearances on the stage.

It is because of this precept that The Distinguished Newspaper gives particular attention to the dress of specialty shop advertisements and endeavors to grace them with the atmosphere that typifies the shops they represent. The resulting ads contrast sharply with their counterparts in the ordinary newspaper, for the latter often treats them in a fashion more suited to the sale of coal or heavy machinery than the merchandising of feminine frills and finery.

Just how great is the difference may be judged from the two pages following. On one is shown the uncouth dress accorded specialty shop advertisements by the ordinary newspaper; the other presents the same ads dressed to fit their parts and set, for the sake of economy, the Linotype Way.

SPECIALTY SHOP ADVERTISING IS OFTEN TOO HEAVY

IS FREQUENTLY SET IN BLACK TYPE UNFITTED TO SUBJECT AND HARD TO READ

The fact that type creates a definite impression upon readers altogether aside from the message it carries has been demonstrated times without number. In its own right it is able to create an atmosphere akin to the subject it presents. Bold, black type immediately suggests strength and masculinity. Light, flowing type, on the other hand, as soon gets over the idea of feminine delicacy. There is nothing particularly obscure about the differences, yet, in turning the pages of the average newspaper, one is continually faced with ads of feminine appeal set in heavy types, and conversely, masculine ads composed in types of delicate design.

Specialty shop advertising is a constant sufferer in this respect, probably because it can take greater advantage of sympathetic treatment than many other types of advertising. Specialty shops are founded on an atmosphere of exclusiveness and refinement. It permeates every transaction, yet it often escapes the advertising, simply because the person in charge has overlooked the possibility of continuing that atmosphere through a careful selection of type.

The two advertisements on this page offer examples. The one to the right, while appealing to a feminine patronage, is set in faces that suggest anything but the frilly delicacy of the wares it offers. The black, serif-less characters not only create an impression foreign to their subject, but are difficult to read, as well. In no sense is it dressed for its part as the emissary of a house catering to the feminine population of the city in which it is located.

The advertisement below is likewise poorly attired, but it may be said that its difficulties do not arise so much from the materials of its dress as from the manner in which they have been fashioned. Here the type face employed is not so black in itself but the large size, set in a wide measure and close to the borders, creates an air of massiveness that is little less damaging to its effectiveness than the bolder type of the other. Taken as a whole, this ad is an excellent argument in favor of the ample use of white space as an aid to attractiveness and legibility.

Effectiveness of Specialty Ads Increased by Care In Choice of Types

Here is a page that quickly tells the advantages to be gained from setting specialty shop advertisements in types that convey an atmosphere fitting to the businesses they represent. Immediately these ads establish an impression akin to that one would receive from a visit to the shops of the advertisers. There is about them an air that is far more in keeping with the merchandise they offer than is the case with their counterparts on the opposite page.

Great as is the difference between these two pages, it has been achieved simply through the exercise of care in the choice of type faces and their arrangement in the space available. In both instances the same amount of space has been utilized, the same drawing has been used, and no recourse has been made to anything other than typographic materials in the improvement of the ads.

Consider them one at a time. The startling contrast between the advertisement to the left and its original is traceable to the substitution of attractive Garamond and Garamond Italic for the heavy Gothic faces and the arrangement of this lighter type in groups rather than in a straggling, disordered line down the page. The possible objection that it makes room for more copy is easily overweighed by the fact that its increased attraction and legibility make it far easier to read than its counterpart. In consequence it will get over a more complete story to a greater number of people than the other and do it more effectively because it maintains the spirit of the shop sponsoring it.

Both the advertisement below and the one from which it is reset are composed in the same type, Clearface Bold. Here the improvement is achieved through the use of a larger size than that of the original for the headline and of smaller sizes for the balance of the text. This permits the setting of the copy in a smaller panel and surrounds it with an abundance of white space which increases its readability.

Better Composition Pays Two Profits the Linotype Way

Rapid interchange from one attractive type face to another and line-at-a-time composition are Linotype advantages that insure economical operation of the ad alley. By reducing the normal cost of composition and make-up to a minimum, they enable the newspaper to devote fuller attention to the planning of the advertisements on the hook and result in the production of advertising above the average in effectiveness, advertising that justifies a higher rate because it creates more business for the advertiser.

Thus it is that The Distinguished Newspaper finds a double profit in following the Linotype Way. It facilitates The Distinguished Newspaper in its effort at "dressing ads to fit their part" and is instrumental in endowing its advertising with the effectiveness that places a paying premium on every line of its advertising space.

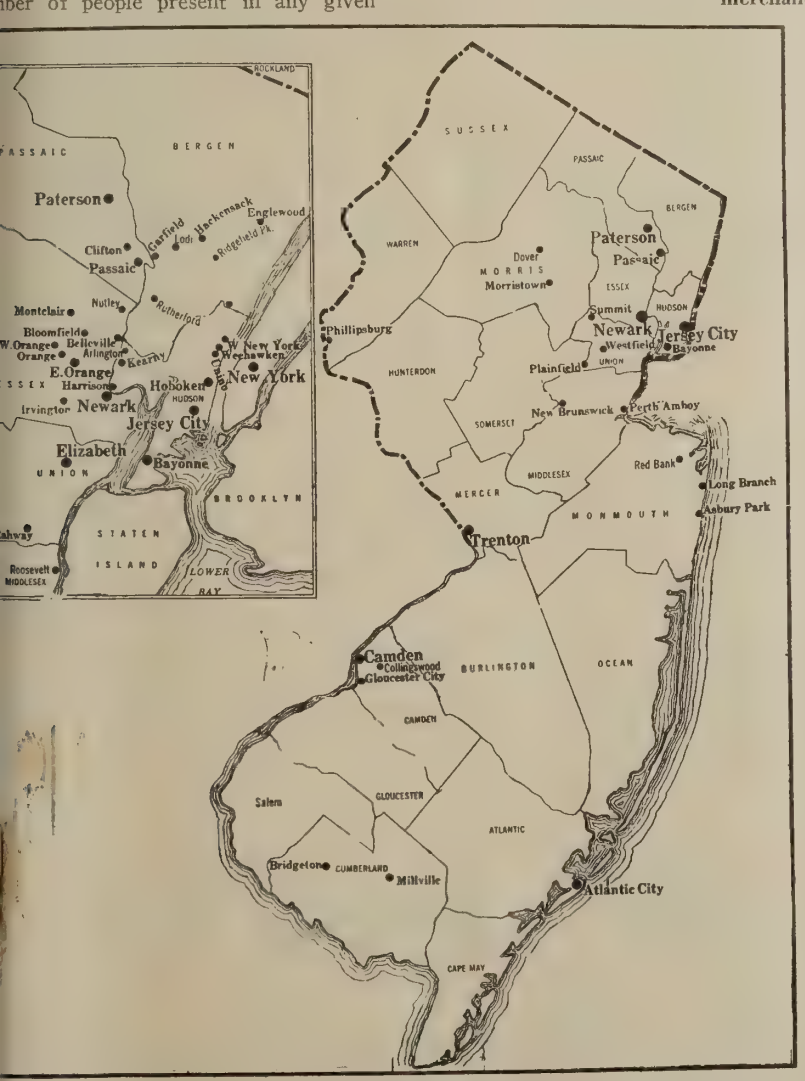
The tabulation is an rt to represent the consumer buying- ity of the nation, subdivided into es, counties, and cities of more than 00 population along logical lines, elim- ing several factors which, while often l in estimates of this kind, do not ess the recent and direct indicative ue demanded. In this tabulation the damental factors have been limited to ulation and Income. The source of first class of information is obviously Census Bureau. The source in the nd is the Treasury Department's t recent tabulation of the number of me tax returns filed in each of the lities listed. On these bases—the ber of people present in any given territory with needs and desires to be met, and the evidence of their ability to purchase goods and services to meet these needs and desires—this survey has been constructed.

The process of determining the index numbers is simplicity itself. The population of the United States is represented as 100 per cent. The 1925 estimates of the Census Bureau were taken as the most recent reliable figures. The percentage of each state, county and city of more than 10,000 population was calculated to four decimal places, in order to have a figure which would be available for the smallest communities.



With 1924 income tax figures as a basis, the number of all returns in the United States was taken as 100 per cent and the percentage of returns listed for each community was likewise figured to four decimal places.

At this point another element is in-

PASTORS WROTE DAILY EDITORIALS FOR WEEK

Innovation Aroused Interest on Kansas Daily—Urged Capital Punishment and Debt Cancellation

By Ben Hibbs

Arkansas City, Kan., June 30.—Readers of the Arkansas City Daily Traveler saw matters of the moment through new eyes recently when the ministers of the city took charge of the Traveler's editorial column for a period of two weeks.

Each of the ministers was invited to contribute the entire content of the editorial column for one day. The writers were allowed to use the column in any way they saw fit. No subject was barred.

During the period of their "editorship" the ministers managed to rip to pieces many of the favorite editorial opinions of Kansas newspapers, including some of the Traveler's choicest theories. Commenting on everything from local situations and the practices of newspapers to the cancellation of war debts, the pastors managed to keep the pot of controversy boiling during the time they occupied the editorial chair.

Atheism, "pseudo-evolution," and the publication of crime news were set forth in turn as being some of the "greatest evils" which threaten America today.

The ministers criticized in a half-jesting way several of the Traveler's practices, including the publication of stories regarding the "luck" of Sunday fishing parties.

Kansas papers had merry sport over one of the editorials written by the Rev. C. D. Walker, pastor of the Christian Church, in which the minister challenged the luckless editor of the Traveler to occupy his pulpit for one Sunday. The pastor seemed to feel that it was only fair to return the compliment.

The two editorials which probably drew the most comment from the press of Kansas were written by the same pastor, the Rev. Elmer Kirkpatrick, Baptist. His human interest editorial, "Preachers Are Human," was widely copied, and another article in which he vigorously advocated the cancellation of the European war debts was sharply criticized by several editors, including Former Governor Henry Allen in his Wichita Beacon.

The Rev. M. Kretzmann, Lutheran, attracted no little attention when he took a stand for capital punishment, which is prohibited in Kansas. The minister, to prove his case, quoted from the scriptures and cited England's example. His editorial is the more interesting when it is remembered that capital punishment was made unlawful in this state largely through the efforts of ministers and church organizations.

The Traveler found that its readers were keenly interested in the experiment. Arkansas City is quite distinctly a "church town," and probably 75 per cent of the Traveler readers are church members. They were more than eager to see "how their ministers would look in print." The plan will be followed out again next year.

Oscar S. Stauffer is the publisher of the Traveler.

A committee which will take charge of the American participation in the International Press Exhibition at Cologne, May to October, 1928, was appointed last week by John Clyde Oswald, of the New York Employing Printers Association. A meeting will be held at the New York Advertising Club, July 18, at noon.

FOREIGN CORPS HOST TO BELGIAN AMBASSADOR

New York Group Gives Farewell Dinner to Diplomat as He Leaves for Court of St. James—He Praises Newspaper Men

The Association of Foreign Press Correspondents, New York, entertained as their guest Baron E. de Cartier de Marchienne, the Belgian Ambassador, at the Lawyers Club, New York City, on Thursday, June 23, on the eve of his departure from the United States to take up his new duties as Ambassador to the Court of St. James, London. Leonce Levy, U. S. correspondent of Le Matin, Paris, president of the Association, introduced the Ambassador.

"During the ten years I have been here," responded Baron de Cartier, "I have had nothing but the most sympathetic dealings with the press in the United States. I have never been misquoted. And among the representatives of the press there are none I have greater pleasure in knowing than the foreign correspondents. My old friend Percy Bullen was a friend indeed because he was a friend in need" (Mr. Bullen led a campaign for Belgian relief during the War) "and Mr. Merck was most helpful also." The Ambassador also referred to other correspondents he had known and added, "I shall leave this country with the most pleasant memories of the constant sympathy that I have found among the men of the press."

Dr. A. M. Nawench, director of the Polish Telegraphic Agency, New York, and last year's president of the association, also spoke.

KANSAS DAILIES SOLD

O. S. Stauffer and Associates Acquire Pittsburg Headlight and Sun

The Pittsburg (Kan.) Headlight, evening, and the Pittsburg Sun, morning, have been sold by Moore Brothers to a group headed by Oscar S. Stauffer, publisher of the Arkansas City. (Kan.) Traveler. Charles L. Nicholson of the Hutchinson News and Herald. and George A. Winters of Chicago, part owners with Mr. Stauffer, will have charge of the Pittsburg papers. The amount of the deal was not stated.

On Oct. 1, 1926, Mr. Stauffer and associates consolidated the two newspapers at Independence, Kan. This gives them four Kansas newspapers, the morning and evening Pittsburg papers, the Independence Reporter and the Arkansas City Traveler. The new owners took charge in Pittsburg July 1.

J. T. Moore and George Moore have owned the Pittsburg Headlight for 39 years and about six months ago purchased the morning paper from their competitors, Strong Brothers. The Moore brothers will continue to operate a job printing plant in Pittsburg.

WOULD UNIONIZE DAILIES

A resolution calling upon all units of organized labor to co-operate in a movement to unionize the two newspapers at Asheville, N. C., was passed at the second annual session of the Virginia-Carolina Typographical conference, held at Winston-Salem, June 19. The papers are now running on the "open shop" plan.

ORATORICAL CONTEST BOOSTED SOUTH

Students from 16 States Entered in Competition Sponsored by Nashville Banner—$975 in Cash Prizes

One of the most unusual oratorical contests ever conducted in the South recently came to a close.

Only one subject was permissible, and that was "The Progress, Resources and Needs of the South." It was open to undergraduates at any four-year college or university in the 16 states classed as Southern, including several bordering on other sections. These states were Alabama, Arkansas, Florida, Georgia, Kentucky, Louisiana, Maryland, Mississippi, Missouri, North Carolina, Oklahoma, South Carolina, Tennessee, Texas, Virginia and West Virginia. The contest was proposed and sponsored by the Nashville Banner, which offered all of the prizes.

This paper, a year or so ago, had conducted a "Know Tennessee" oratorical campaign, the purpose of which was to stimulate study of the resources and advantages of the state, and it aroused such wide interest the paper decided to apply the same idea to the entire South. Appeal was made to students of the whole section, and the response was general.

When the time limit had arrived it was found that 58 institutions, located in 15 states, had officially designated representatives. The semi-finals, or regional contests, were held at Atlanta, Memphis, Shreveport and Emory, Va., on May 7, when one speaker was chosen from each quartet of states to represent it in the finals in the imposing Tennessee War Memorial building, at Nashville, two weeks later.

To each regional winner had been presented a handsome silver trophy and each received a cash award in the finals, first prize being $500; second, $250; third, $125; fourth, $100. Governor Austin Peay presided and the judges were members of the highest judiciary in the state.

troduced which is usually missing in current indices of buying ability or sales quotas. This method recognizes that the purchasing ability of the consumer as an individual or as a group cannot be determined or stated with one figure to apply with equal force to his purchases of table salt and his investment in a new automobile, nor to any of the many articles occupying intermediate points in the scale of necessities and luxuries.

For this reason an arbitrary weighting was adopted in this survey and commodities were divided into six general classes, which are described with the weightings allowed, as follows:

Class I Cheap necessities and bulk staples. Population 70 per cent. Number of incomes 10 per cent.

Class II Moderate priced necessities and packaged staples. Population 70 per cent. Number of incomes 30 per cent.

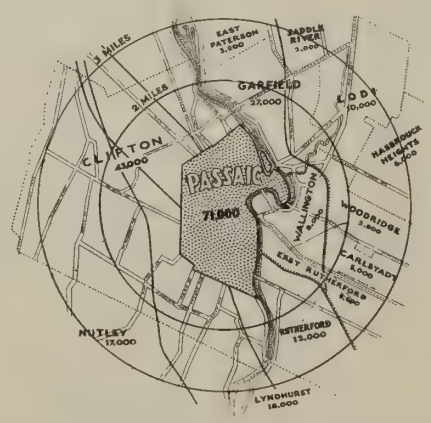
Class III Quality priced necessities and staples. Cheap luxuries and low priced non-staples. Population 50 per cent. Number of incomes 50 per cent.

Class IV Fancy priced necessities and staples. Moderate priced luxuries and non-staples. Population 30 per cent. Number of incomes 70 per cent.

Class V Quality priced luxuries and non-staples. Population 10 per cent. Number of incomes 90 per cent.

Class VI Fancy priced exclusive luxuries of high unit value. Population 10 per cent. Number of incomes over $10,000, 90 per cent.

First In Circulation 1,438 Ahead



The Passaic Daily Herald has today the largest circulation of any newspaper ever published in Passaic.

Its average daily circulation for the three months ending March 31, 1927, was 15,536.

This gives The Herald a lead over the second Passaic newspaper of 1,438 copies daily.

The Herald's average daily circulation of 15,536 is the largest paid distribution ever reached by any Passaic newspaper—and it is still growing.

The map that is shown on this page shows the territory served by The Herald and the "elbow room" that Passaic and its environs have for expansion.

TEN YEARS OF SPACE GRABBING ENDS WITH $300,000 PAID CAMPAIGN

Institute of American Meat Packers to Buy Space in 139 Dailies to Popularize Ham and Bacon During July and August—H. K. McCann Agency in Charge

FOR the first time in its 10-year history, the Institute of American Meat Packers will commence a campaign in paid newspaper space on July 7, to continue to the end of August. The drive is designed particularly to popularize use of ham and bacon during the summer months.

Hitherto, relations of the group to the public have been exclusively through publicity, according to Pendleton Dudley, public relations counsel of New York, in charge of the Institute's eastern district.

"Now the Institute is better co-ordinated than it has been in the past," Mr. Dudley said to EDITOR & PUBLISHER. "We all hope that this first paid advertising campaign will work out well enough to justify its continuance.

"In our dealings with the public, we will do as the case demands. That is, when the Institute has something to tell that is legitimate news we will send it out to the newspapers as publicity, and, when the Institute has something to sell, as is the case in the present campaign, we will buy space in the advertising columns."

The Institute's paid advertising campaign announced this week will enlist, according to officials, 15,000 packer salesmen and 100,000 retailers and will "have the backing of the industry all the way from the farm to the shop counter." The Institute numbers 250 members.

Mr. Dudley said the appropriation was more than $300,000, of which, according to present plans, $150,000 will be spent in newspaper advertising and $150,000 in window displays, posters and similar tie-up advertising. Newspapers in more than 125 cities will be used.

The Chicago office of the H. K. McCann Company, is directing the account.

The fund of $300,000 is being contributed by member companies of the Institute and by other packers and wholesalers who wish to share in benefits of the movement.

The first newspaper advertisement is scheduled to appear July 7, in 139 dailies. The campaign will continue with one advertisement a week for eight weeks.

Oscar G. Mayer, Oscar Mayer & Co., Chicago, is president of the Institute of American Meat Packers. W. W. Woods of the Institute's Chicago office is executive vice president.

Other officials are:

Vice Presidents—J. J. Felin, John J. Felin & Co., Inc., Philadelphia, Pa.; Myron McMillan, J. T. McMillan Company, Inc., St. Paul, Minn.; F. S. Snyder, Batchelder & Snyder Co., Boston, Mass.; E. A. Cudahy, Jr., Cudahy Packing Co., Chicago.

CHANGES MEETING PLACE

Anglo-American Press Group Now Convenes at Hotel Drouant

The Anglo-American Press Association, Paris, has changed its weekly meeting place, and now lunches every Wednesday at the Hotel Drouant, Place Gaillon, just off the Avenue de l'Opéra.

At the inaugural meeting in the new quarters one of the largest gatherings of correspondents and guests attended, more than 60 being present.

The principal guest was Dr. Herbert Adams Gibbons, who had quite a lot to say about Byrd and his Atlantic flight, promising his hearers that before these lines reach America Byrd and his companions would be lunching with the American and British correspondents in Paris.

SCHUYLER IN AIR FLIGHT

Stuart S. Schuyler, president of the Allied Newspapers, Inc., who was attending the Denver convention of the International Advertising Association, left the Colorado city this week and flew to Chicago. Actual flying time, he reported to his new York office, was twelve and a half hours.

In Our

we need several experienced copy men. The work will consist chiefly of preparing copy for local firms — shoe stores, hardware, grocery, drug, clothing stores, etc.

Experience will be a deciding factor in the men we hire. They must be equipped with an education which enables them to write concisely yet convincingly. The work will also consist of the preparation of some direct-by-mail literature.

If you can qualify, send us a photograph, samples of your work, name your last employer, give your age, whether married or single—tell it all in one letter.

THE MACON TELEGRAPH

Another Great Newspaper has adopted INTERTYPE IDEAL NEWS FACE

The Macon (Ga.) Telegraph has just purchased Intertype Ideal News face for a complete change of dress.
Like many other leading newspapers, The Macon Telegraph first installed a few Intertypes and then they adopted standardized Intertypes exclusively.

P. T. Anderson, General Manager, says:

We feel that the Intertype is the best machine, from point of production and general service, we have ever used.

In another letter, T. E. Billings, Foreman, writes:

In May, 1926, we installed ten Intertypes. Since that time we have put them to every test possible, and they have come up to every requirement. The Intertype is the most elastic machine I have ever worked with. We can convert our entire battery to straight composition at a moment's notice, or we can throw as many machines on ad composition as our requirements demand. We are getting 20% more type in less hours than formerly. All operators are highly pleased. Distributor stops are a rarity now.

Note that both Foreman and General Manager emphasize increased production and dependable service. Aren't you interested in these features?

Write for Intertype literature or ask us to send our local representative to see you.

EDITORIAL

My doctrine shall drop as the rain, my speech shall distil as the dew, as the small rain upon the tender herb, and as the showers upon the grass:—Deuteronomy, XXXII; 2.

SOME SUGGESTIONS

"SOMETIMES I get tired and run out of ideas," writes an editor of an important newspaper, adding: "Everything runs smoothly in this city, as a rule, though I may be too close to the forest to see anything but a few trees. I would be delighted to have a few editorial suggestions from EDITOR & PUBLISHER."

The invitation is flattering. We have only a sketchy idea of the editor's community, but happily volunteer some random ideas: It seems to us that a newspaper is in a very high order of local business when it is engaged in fostering institutions that make for common urban health and pleasure. Naturally we think of the recreation center, equally for youth and the adult population. Such institutions as neighborhood social centers in densely populated industrial sections do magnificent work. Think of Hull House in Chicago and Hiram House in Cleveland! Get behind any public park or field enterprise which is calculated to make families play together and bring marriageable persons into wholesome contact. Stimulate interest in anything which offers the average individual opportunity for self-expression and initiative. Tell your readers where to find recreation.

Encourage the public forum along genuinely democratic lines.

Seek to solve for the center of your city its traffic problem. We do not know what it is, but we know it is there.

Regularly investigate all public welfare institutions, schools, prisons, asylums, etc., and take the good, square, humanitarian view of the average citizen as regards their conduct. Regularly inspect all public works and write about them, singing their praises or damning them as they deserve.

If your city is plagued by scattered and wasteful charities, look into the wonderful "Community Chest" idea that many cities have adopted, Cleveland having probably developed it best.

Take a more lively interest in amateur sports, remembering the good they do and the fact that the back lot game is usually really worth seeing. Certainly every American city should have public diamonds, links and courts and a stadium, if possible.

Make your readers familiar with the history of their city and state. Ignorance on this subject is often appalling. In fact, as a nation we have a very shadowy historical background.

If you have a slum, fight it, month in and month out. There is no city in America so poor that it cannot overcome these hotbeds of disease, crime and ignorance.

Fight, also, physical ugliness in your city—those ghostly deserted old frame houses that are falling to pieces over a term of twenty years right in the center of the town, or near the railroad station, because of the selfishness of some landowner or the neglect of some estate agent. It is perfectly feasible and quite right that such defacements of a fair city should be outlawed.

Take greater pride in cultural developments. Every city should possess a shrine where beauty may be worshipped by the public, whether it be an institution for the display of works of art, natural history, botany, a library, or what not.

Pay attention to the thought in your labor circles—a subject which too many newspapers are neglecting. If there is unemployment, make it your concern.

Remember that there is a great battle in this country against illiteracy and that some magnificent work is being done in educating adults. Is there interest there for you?

Investigate the local gang spirit and find means to supplant it with wholesome influences.

Fight fakers and exploiters, high and low, whether they be of the breed that sells worthless stock, glossed-over automobile wrecks, swamp land, or "cures" which do not cure. Have your bankers tell you how much money your people were defrauded out of last year by fake stock and land salesmen and look up the facts on blue-sky legislation.

Preach the good gospel of right living and sensible diet, and don't be too sure that the medical doctors of your city know it all or practise all of the virtues.

Interest yourself in public utilities and see to it that your people get a square deal from any corporation that deals with them through public license.

Every city, like every man, should have individuality and distinctive features to characterize it. The standardized city is a deplorable modern development. If you have originality, it will be possible to make your city famous for some trait or some institution of particular merit. Boston boasts popular opera and symphony concerts, among many other splendid distinctive features; Cincinnati is also a music center. In recent years Cleveland has developed a splendid feeling for art and possesses a beautiful gallery. Her park system and recreation centers are models. Atlanta has "opera week" and Stone Mountain. Raleigh has preserved her magnificent old state house, a dream of Colonial architecture. San Francisco has Golden Gate Park and a wonderful auditorium. Portland has a grand drive. St. Petersburg, Fla., is distinguished by broad streets and a marvelous causeway. These are but vagrant suggestions, but every city should possess something notable, a real show place or an original feature of life worth talking about. It is a newspaper's business to satisfy such local pride. Nothing that belongs to the people should seem impossible of attainment by any newspaper editor. When a newspaper is fighting for the upbuilding of its city, morally, physically or politically, it is only functioning a primary duty.

Motion-picture interests that have been fostered by the press, in fair weather and foul, until they have monopolized the amusement field, are now engaged in subsidizing a little, half-baked skullduggery to break the standard newspaper amusement advertising rate. The truth about the amusement rate is that it is usually outrageously low, considering the service rendered.

THE GREAT CHALLENGE

CHESTER H. ROWELL has an interesting theory to explain why American business men who are frenzied with fear of bolshevism should look with favor on fascism, although political economists see in the latter the greater menace to our democracy if it is made to parade as Americanism. He holds it is an American failing to judge other things than business by business standards and as fascism seems like "good business" the conclusion is jumped at that it is good for everything.

It is "good business" to create a censorship that has silenced the Italian press, but is that good for politics, for religion, for social advancement? Democracy holds for freedom.

Nicholas Murray Butler is another student who believes fascism is a more dangerous challenge to democracy than is bolshevism. He told a meeting of American editors not long ago that if democracy is to stand it must not only actively defend itself, but be more worthy of its name. Both he and Mr. Rowell agree that the great crime in America is our indifference to the original principles of government. Democracy has really become unpopular or, at least, uninteresting. The need of the day is a method by which newspapers and all other leaders of thought can revive genuine interest in our public affairs and spoof ignorant flag-waving off the board.

A Sunday paper bought on Saturday or Friday to us seems like a Christmas tree on the Fourth of July.

CASHING IN

A REVELATION of the week on the profoundly important subject of the service of the "public relations expert" was that since 1919 Ivy L. Lee, king of press agents, had cleaned up $212,954, tax-payers' money, for the issuance of propaganda intended to convince the taxpayers that they should pay higher fares for transportation on subway and elevated lines and other sundry duties. Mr. Lee pictured himself as having busily written car-cards and also of having given the officials of the Interborough Rapid Transit Company much advice about how the people were feeling on the subject of a raise in rate.

Is it possible, the people of New York are asking, that a man could receive that stupendous sum, charged to operating expenses, for such a trifling duty as the writing of those simple car cards, telling riders for instance that there was a fine zoo in the Bronx, that the red-ball was up for skaters at the park lakes and that the Interborough was the world's safest railroad? It seems incredible, especially in view of the meagre pay the same company allows to a motorman who drives a 10-car train at lightning speed through the dark tunnels, guardian of some 2,000 human lives. What is this great service that Mr. Lee renders which costs in eight years more than a motorman could earn in a hundred years of such nerve-racking toil? The car-cards might be written by any intelligent stenographer. What did Ivy L. Lee do for the tax-payers? Perhaps the city editors of New York newspapers, whom Mr. Lee claims to know so well, or the reporters who go to Lee's office for "news," might shed light on the mystery if questioned by a good sharp lawyer. Perhaps Mr. Lee's advice on "company unions," and how to break a strike of workmen, and how to make newspapers represent such workmen as "outlaws," may have been worth his price, but think of tax-payers footing the bill!

The easy way that the New York papers, with a couple of mild exceptions, have this week permitted Lee to "get away with it" has interested us. The World, that used to thunder loudest at Lee's occasional interference with clear public thinking on public questions, wasn't so sure that there was anything reprehensible in the "public relations expert" trade. Shades of the great J. P. !

Whatever else the airmen may accomplish they grandly serve by lifting our eyes from the sordid earth.

THIS COMPLEX AGE

ONE of the best talks on advertising that we have recently seen appears in an attractive booklet issued by John F. Hurst, of the Henri, Hurst & McDonald agency. It bears the challenging title "The Universal Question—Can We Stay In Business?" With facts and figures the author shows how precarious modern business has become. The world is moving with amazing rapidity, ringing changes that make even great industries and vast businesses obsolete in a short time if their managements are not resourceful to keep abreast of the tides of popularity and preference. The case of Ford is cited. A few years ago "transportation" was what the public wished to buy and Ford supplied it magnificently. Two years ago people who had never had much money began to get money and with it came a desire for "transportation plus style" and in 1926 Ford sales decreased 18 per cent while Chevrolet sales increased 30 per cent.

Illustrating the perils involved in old-style production Mr. Hurst asks: "What has become of the old-fashioned razor? The old phonograph? What happened to cotton hosiery? How would you like to be a manufacturer of hair-nets? When did you last see a fur muff? Would you rather buy stock in the ice business or in electric refrigeration? When did you last take a horse-and-buggy ride?" Styles change and the universal craving is for new things.

The surest way to reduce sales costs, when the product is right, is efficient advertising. This is particularly true in this day when the cry of the manufacturer is for simplified distribution, when dealers are inclined to buy only for current needs and for quick turn-over and when the power of the chain stores has become so great. The appeal must now be made direct to the consumer.

NO. 136 AKRON, OHIO, WEDNESDAY EVENING, MAY 11, 1927 (THIRTY-TWO PAGES) PRICE

The EYES Have It!

Linotype IONIC No. 5

"EASIER TO READ"

That is what thousands of BEACON JOURNAL readers are saying today as they scan the columns of this newspaper

THE REASON

(From the Akron Beacon Journal)

THE BEACON JOURNAL, ever alert to the most modern newspaper improvements, has adopted an entirely new dress! A new type face!

This recently perfected type-face, known in the printing trade under the name of "Ionic No. 5," is relieving millions of eyes from daily strain. More than 320 leading newspapers of the country have adopted this new type-face, and the BEACON JOURNAL is pleased to be the first to present it to readers of Akron and vicinity. (Above paragraph is the new type.)

The change in the style of type involved replacement of all matrices on linotype machines setting the body type of the paper, and results in broader and "fatter" faced letters, utilizing more of what might be called waste space in the line, although the number of letters and spaces in each line remains the same.

(This paragraph is set in the old type.)

Witness the change! the paragraphs in the first column give an excellent idea of the superiority of the new type over the old.

Eyesight experts, everywhere, have proclaimed this new type as beneficial.

"It is clearer, it is easier on the eyes, it is an even greater pleasure to read the paper, and the effect on both children and adults is bound to be beneficial," says Milton C. Potter, superintendent of schools at Milwaukee, Wis. Others expressed similar approval when the Milwaukee Journal adopted the same type that BEACON JOURNAL readers are given today. In other cities, readers were unanimous in praise of the type-face.

The improvement of the type-face is only one of many changes already made, or contemplated by this newspaper. With its entry into the new $1,000,000 BEACON JOURNAL building, in a few months, readers will be given all the features and service made possible by one of the most modern newspaper plants in this country.

The comment of readers on the change in type-face is invited.

Oculist Says Beacon Journal's New Type Is Scientifically Designed to Yield Utmost of Reading Ease.

THE BEACON JOURNAL'S new type-face is scientifically designed to yield the utmost of reading ease.

That is the expert opinion of Dr. S. A. Freeman, oculist, of 77 S. Howard Street. He made the statement after carefully studying the type. The benefit to the BEACON JOURNAL'S readers will be far-reaching and beyond the average reader's comprehension, he said.

"I noticed the change of type as soon as I picked up the paper Monday and began a study of it," he declared. "The more I look at it the more I am of the opinion the BEACON JOURNAL has done a great thing for the benefit of its readers.

"From my viewpoint, it is one of the greatest improvements the paper could have made. The type relieves the eye-strain, in that it increases the angle of vision and results in the lessening of the strain on the nerves, which would be forced to concentrate more in picking up the smaller angle. The angle of vision is the basis of making all eye tests," he declared.

THROWN DOWN STAIRS IN HOBOKEN; ALYCIA LIKES "THE GAME"

Miss Patterson, Daughter of the New York Daily News Owner, Has Had Enough Thrills in 10 Weeks of Newspaper Work to Want to Stay at It

By PHILIP SCHUYLER

AFTER 10 weeks as a newspaper woman, Alycia Patterson, 20 year-old daughter of Capt. Joseph M. Patterson, editor and publisher of the New York Daily News, has relented sufficiently to tell EDITOR & PUBLISHER what it feels like to work for Dad's tabloid.

"I'm simply mad about it," she said, and looked as though she meant it.

When news first broke that Alycia had joined the News, "powerful interests" held the EDITOR & PUBLISHER to the barest announcement of the important event. The powerful interests, of course, were the five feet two or so of Miss Patterson herself.

Now she knows what it feels like to get turned down on a story, and this week consented to be interviewed.

"Yes," she explained, "I've already been thrown down stairs. It happened over in Hoboken," she laughed. "Imagine it, Hoboken!

"And so, perhaps, I'm a little more sympathetic than I was a few weeks ago.

"The Hoboken story was about a woman who was said to henpeck her husband. There was some court case, I believe, and it came out that she only gave her husband 50 cents a day.

"My assignment was to go over and interview 'Mama.' I climbed I don't know how many flights of stairs before I found the right door. The woman opened it, and she looked about 10 feet wide to me.

"I started to say something and got about as far as the Daily News, when —downstairs I went, and not exactly right side up either."

Despite such an inauspicious beginning, Miss Patterson has made up her mind that newspaper work will be her life work, she said. She had, indeed, become veteran enough at the business to reply that she "hadn't the time" when asked if she had ambitions to write a play for her talented sister Elinor to act in, or a novel, or a poem.

"All newspaper people talk about and think about those things," she added sagely. "But very few ever seem to get around to doing them. They have too much of a good time being just newspaper people.

"I think the work is the most fun in the world. Far better than going to school, and you learn so much more, too. I know I didn't know what it was all about, I didn't know a thing, before I started in here. I'm just beginning to see things now."

Miss Patterson is receiving $30 a week as a Daily News reporter. She doesn't live at home, she said, but at the Blackstone Hotel. She likes to be independent, and is thinking, somewhat, of moving down to Greenwich Village.

As a Daily News reporter, Miss Patterson was assigned to go over to Roosevelt and Curtis Fields and find out if Lindbergh had any airdrome sweethearts. She wasn't successful in this news quest. She couldn't find any girl daring enough to admit knowing the bashful young hero, although she could have found many who wanted to know him and know him well.

She was at Curtis Field the night before Chamberlin and Levine hopped off for Berlin, and obtained an interview with Mrs. Chamberlin. Expecting to spend the night at the field and watch the take-off next morning, she was disappointed when the office telephoned out ordering her to go home.

"They told me that the flight had been called off again," she smiled ruefully.

Miss Patterson works regularly from 11 in the morning until seven in the evening. She isn't afraid of overtime, however.

On the day of the interview, things weren't running so smoothly for the young new reporter. The assignment of the day was a tough one.

"I was supposed to interview a woman in a Brooklyn jail who killed her husband and now is sorry," she explained. "I went out to the jail, but she won't see anybody. I'm trying to get to her lawyers now."

The publisher's daughter was a little hot and flustered from frequent incubations in the stuffy telephone booths. It was one of the first warm days of the summer. Maybe the weather had something to do with her dejection, when she said:

"You know I made a mistake in the most important story they gave me to do. I feel like I ought to ask Dad to fire me. I'd hate to leave, though. I'm having such a good time."

HEARST BUYS AIRPLANE

Phil Payne Indicates Some Stunt Being Planned for Huge Fokker

Tests are now being made on an eight passenger Fokker airplane, purchased for William Randolph Hearst from the Fokker Aircraft Corporation by Philip A. Payne, managing editor of the New York Daily Mirror.

Mr. Payne has made an initial payment of $20,000 on the machine. Questioned by EDITOR & PUBLISHER, he declined to go into detail in regard to Mr. Hearst's plans for the machine, saying they depended upon the results of the tests. Eventually, he said, it will be used by Mr. Hearst to commute between his ranch at San Luis Obispo and Los Angeles, Cal.

The Mirror's managing editor made several flights in the airplane this week. He also planned to fly from New York to Philadelphia Friday with a plane in the national air tour.

The airplane Mr. Hearst expects to buy is of the enclosed cabin type with thick wooden wings and fuselage of steel tubing.

FLORIDA TO ADVERTISE IN 3,000 WEEKLIES

Bureau of Immigration, Tallahassee, Has $150,000 Appropriation to Invest—Governor Refused $400,000 Budget

(By Telegraph to EDITOR & PUBLISHER*)*

TALLAHASSEE, Fla., June 29.—Officials of the Bureau of Immigration here have announced that the State will soon launch an advertising campaign in country weeklies throughout the nation with the expectation of running it probably one year. The tentative schedule includes approximaely 3,000 newspapers. The fund for advertising was appropriated by the Legislature at its recent session, but is not the $200,000 annually as originally proposed. The Legislature passed a measure carrying an appropriation of $400,000 for two years, but Governor Martin objected after the bill reached him and it was amended to provide $150,000 for the period.

The Bureau of Immigration for several years has had an appropriation of $50,000 annually for advertising space, booklets and pamphlets, and while the additional appropriation of $75,000 is far short of the sum expected, it will enable expansion of advertising activities and the decision to go into weekly columns is the first move in this direction.

At a recent meeting at Leesburg of advertising men and civic workers to discuss the advertising situation, the group expressed keen disappointment at the failure to obtain the $200,000 appropriation and the proposal was made to raise a State-wide advertising fund by popular subscription.

The conference declined to adopt the proposal and instead, appointed a committee to confer with the Commissioner of Agriculture, in charge of the Immigration Bureau, and lend assistance in making the best showing with the appropriation available.

The conference also voted to crystalize public opinion during the next two years so that when the Legislature convenes in 1929 the demand for an adequate advertising appropriation will be so strong that neither the Governor nor the Legislature will refuse to appropriate a necessary sum.

WITH THE GENERAL ADVERTISERS

Chancellor Cigars Opening Newspaper Drives in Many Cities—Oil Burner Directors Meeting July 12 at Detroit—Sheaffer Pen Company Sets Ad Record

CHANCELLOR CIGARS, having completed a newspaper campaign in Baltimore, are opening up drives in other cities as fast as jobbers lay in stocks. Cleveland and Chicago are reported next on the list, which is expected to run well over 100 cities.

The campaign runs good-sized newspaper copy for about two months in each city. Dorrance, Sullivan & Co. handles the account.

Directors of the American Oil Burner Association are scheduled to meet in Detroit, July 12. Prominent members of this association are organizers of the Oil Heating Institute, now conducting an advertising campaign in magazine paid space and asking for free use of newspaper news columns.

Ruffus Richart has been appointed assistant director of the Institute in charge of public relations and publicity. He is a graduate of Dartmouth College and was formerly doing publicity work for the General Electric Company. An official statement regarding the Institute's plans, after naming the magazines to be used, continues:

"News and feature articles also will be furnished regularly by the Institute to a list of more than 100 leading metropolitan newspapers and magazines and to editors of building and financial departments."

Fuel Oil, the association's official organ, lists 23 burner manufacturers as subscribers to the Institute.

Already there has been between $125,000 and $150,000 subscribed, and Leod D. Becker, managing director of the Institute, is negotiating with the oil industry to contribute an equal amount. It is reported that the Standard Oil Company of New York, the Cities Service Company and the Roxana Petroleum Company have been interviewed and have agreed to subscribe.

A list of 208 metropolitan daily newspapers is included in the present record-breaking advertising campaign of the W. A. Sheaffer Pen Company, scheduled to run during July, August and September.

To EDITOR & PUBLISHER, W. Ray Smith of the company's advertising department, said:

"As usual this company will depend largely on the medium of the newspaper to bring immediate results. Sheaffer's have stocked a big supply of window display material, movie slides, newspaper matrices and electros and catalogue cuts so that every one of the 23,000 dealers in the United States will have an opportunity to tie up with the large factory advertisements in these 200 daily publications.

"Sheaffer advertising is blanketing America the year round and that is one of the most important reasons why Sheaffer's led the domestic field in sales for 1926."

For the first time in history, the W. A. Sheaffer Pen Company, Ft. Madison, Ia., is advertising its products in more than half the civilized countries of the world. This announcement was made from the Sheaffer advertising department recently. The countries in which the Lifetime pen is being put before the public through use of the magazine or newspaper columns are as follows: Argentina, Chile, Cuba, Hawaii, Holland, India, Jamaica, Mexico, Panama, Philippine Islands, Spain, Sweden, Uruguay, Canada, China, England, Australia and New Zealand.

The More You Know About the Ludlow —the Bigger It Looks

It is not uncommon for users to say concerning the Ludlo "It is even better than we thought it was." And each day they use it becomes more indispensable.

They use it for setting the most important lines in their pap —the ads and heads—and rightly place it on a plane with the cla and quality of work it does. It gives them all the new, clear-printin type in sluglines they can use, in 6 pt. to full-width 72 pt. and even 8 pt. caps, without machine or mold changes.

They bought the Ludlow because they believed it was the be possible method for setting clean-cut ads and heads that would wi prestige and profits for them and their advertisers. They continu to use it, because they are more firmly convinced than ever th their decision was right.

The fact that they had or could have bought other equipmen yet chose the Ludlow, and have since compared it with various othe methods, yet still prefer using the Ludlow, offers food for though

Your opinion regarding the Ludlow, like theirs, will ever favo ably change—especially if you know the facts about the Ludlow a they really are. May we send them to you?

Winifred Liggett, 19, Kept Long Vigil Covering Jail Mutiny—Grace Forbes Now in Agency Work—Mrs. Walters Heads Houston Ad League

Winifred Liggett

MONG the reporters who covered the mutiny of prisoners at the state penitentiary at Lansing, Kan., June 21, was Miss Winifred Liggett, 19 years old, reporter for the Leavenworth (Kan.) Tribune.

Miss Liggett was allowed to keep vigil in the warden's office while the 328 prisoners held eleven guards prisoner in the coal mines under the prison yards.

When other reporters inquired why the young girl reporter was given such privilege it was explained to them her father was one of the guards held prisoner by the mutineers.

When the mutiny ended the guards and prisoners came up and Miss Liggett obtained the first interview with her father concerning his experiences underground.

Miss Liggett is shown in the photograph at the telephone in the warden's office sending a dispatch to her paper.

Laura Mount, member of the staff of the New York Evening Post, is author of a series of articles for her paper, dealing with conditions in the "bootleg" divorce industry.

Grace Forbes, for a number of years in charge of media selection in the advertising department of the American Tobacco Company, has become associated with the Capehart-Carey Corporation, where she will be space buyer and executive on several accounts.

CLASSIFIED ADVERTISING

"National Classified Week" or "Swap Day" Suggested by Horn at Denver Convention—Marinello Buying Classified Ads—Albany Times-Union Builds Agencies

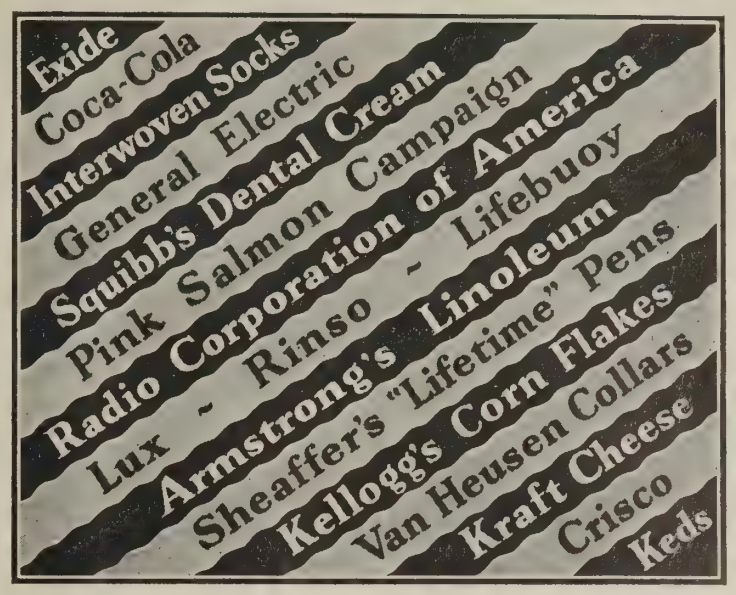
A SUGGESTION that all newspapers of the country combine to promote a "classified advertising week" was made this week by C. W. Horn, classified advertising manager of the New York American, addressing the Denver convention of the National Association of Newspaper Advertising Executives. He said:

"Whereas in the past we have fostered Business Weeks, Fathers' Days, Vaudeville Weeks and many other national special merchandising events—all calling upon the public for a considerable financial expenditure—why not agree today to set apart some week of the year when all newspapers of America, through editorials, news stories, special advertising and every other conceivable form of tie-in co-operate to concentrate the attention of America on the value, the importance, the utility and possibilities of classified advertising.

"Let us promote a national Classified Week! Call it that, or 'Satisfaction' Week or 'Happiness' Week or inaugurate a 'National Swap Day'. What a mighty impression could be made! What increased interest could be aroused! What illimitable dividends to advertisers! Editorials in every paper of the land. Human interest stories with screamer headings. Full page display ads, specially prepared for national use. 'Build classified? We are all making an attempt to do this individually. Why not let us merge our separate aims for one week and marshal the combined forces of newspaper influence in a mammoth annual educational effort in the interests of classified, and we will thus be building classified assiduously and building it to make it pay?

National School of Cosmeticians, organized by the manufacturers of Marinello, beauty preparation, are buying classified space in newspapers through the G. Lynn Summer Company, Inc., New York.

A first page feature similar to the "Ask Me Another" series is being used by the Middletown (N. Y.) Daily Herald in conjunction with classified advertising promotion. A list of questions on current news events, under the title of "It Was in the Paper," is published at the foot of page one, with "answers on the classified page."



Classified advertising agencies are being established in small towns and villages by the Albany (N. Y.) Times-Union as a new feature of its service. The agents include chiefly pharmacists and general store keepers. The names of the accredited agents are published daily on the country news pages.

ADVERTISING STAFF OUTING

Two hundred and fifty members of the advertising department of the Chicago Tribune held their annual party at Col. R. R. McCormick's Cantigny farm, June 23. They came in from New York, Boston, Philadelphia and Atlanta for the gathering with the Chicago staff members on the farm near Wheaton, Ill.

BUILDING NEWSPAPER CIRCULATION

Where Circulation Was King—Cutting Down Delivery Truck Accidents —An Old Idea in a New Dress—How Many Twins in Your Town?

CIRCULATION was king in Atlanta last week. Only circulation managers amounted to much, and Harold Hough, of the Fort Worth Star Telegram and Record, the new president, drew laughter when he said:

"They put the editorial department up near the roof, because they're always up in the air, anyhow."

But in roundtable discussions, many of these men who distribute the papers agreed there was nothing better than a good news story to set circulation figures soaring. During the last 14 weeks, they said, murder trial and aviation news have put on readers to stay, in some cases, and in others have prevented the usual seasonal slump. One paper reported that last year's drop of 6,200 had been held to 1,000, while another boasted the addition of 30,000 circulation in three months.

Still there was room for complaint, such as, for instance, that voiced as follows:

"When a big news story is on the front page, our editor is content to let it go at that. It seems to me that then is the time to strike with a new serial, or other special editorial feature if you wanted to keep the new readers attracted to your paper. When I make this suggestion all I get is the cold shoulder and the remark, 'Who's running the editorial department, you or I?'

"I hear plenty of complaints about my paper, but the editor won't listen to them. All he hears is praise, because people think that flattery will help them to publicity.

"Some stories aren't kept alive long enough, and others are left to die too soon.

"Who said, 'Circulation was King?'"

"It's one of those newspaper drivers!"

Said with reproach this comment is becoming increasingly common in cities of the country where traffic jams and reckless driving, mixed with the desire to get the paper out to stands and delivery points ahead of the opposition, are contributing their share in alarming fashion to the toll of motor accidents. Settling claims, or going to court when necessary, is a leak in the newspaper pocket-book worth stuffing.

Chicago American has found a way in the organization of its own safety commission, the members of which are the paper's truck drivers, and the officers of which are the newspaper's attorney, the business manager, circulation manager, and superintendent of the garage. The American claims that the commission has cut accidents among its drivers 50 per cent.

Every driver in an accident must appear before the commission which meets once a week. They are supplied with a model automobile (a ten cent store toy) and a toy street car is necessary, with which to explain how the accident occurred. They are instructed to place the models in position similar to that of their car before the crash, and to report what was said and done and see before, during and after the accident.

Two men have been fired as a result of hearings before the safety commission. Others have been fined. The American claims the union endorses the idea, and is certain the moral effect has helped to curb reckless newspaper driving in Chicago.

This circulation idea isn't new, but James Brooks, circulation manager of the Tampa Times, is now well satisfied that an old idea, dressed in new style, can turn the trick. In Tampa, it is netting the Times an average of seven orders a day in addition to smiles and good wishes from subscribers. It works this way:

A young girl, provided with a telephone directory of Tampa, becomes, forthwith the Service Department of the Tampa Times. She begins with the letter 'A,' and telephones Tampa homes and business offices.

"This is the Service Department of the Times," she commences conversation. The girl is chosen for her well-modulated voice and courteous manner. "We are calling up to find out whether or not you are receiving your paper regularly; to see if you have any complaints whatever to make."

If the person on the other end of the wire answers that she is not a subscriber, the service department begins "her" sales talk. She keeps track in her telephone book of subscribers and non-subscribers, making follow-ups possible.

Mr. Brooks said he is receiving many letters complimenting the Times on the establishment of its service department. He is content with the orders he is receiving.

How many twins are there in your city?

When this question came to the mind of Ralph Parsons, Duluth News-Tribune, he decided to find out, and after he had found out, he developed a contest that is helping him hold his readers.

He learned, by staging a contest with small prizes, that there were more than 200 twins in Duluth. By this contest he also obtained photographs. Now he has shuffled the pictures and is printing the twins in different issues, offering prizes to the general public to match them up.

Mr. Parsons started this latter contest running in both daily and Sunday issues. He knows it is creating interest because many daily subscribers have written in and subscribed for Sunday also, in order not to miss the "twin puzzle."

Whether or not to cut out all special subscription rates will be a topic before the Carolinas Circulation Managers Association's next convention to be held at Asheville, N. C., Oct. 18-19. Some papers in North and South Carolina are selling their paper at half-price to country preachers, school teachers, post masters, and others considered "poor but proud."

Will X. Coley, Raleigh (N. C.) News and Observer, and president of the group called a meeting of his association during the I. C. M. A. convention at Atlanta last week. It was decided at that time to invite Tennessee circulation men to attend the Asheville meeting.

Among those attending the special Atlanta session were:—J. R. Marks, Asheville Citizen; C. H. Herring, Raleigh (N. C.) Times; C. C. Council, Durham (N. C.) Herald; S. B. Bagwell, Charlotte (N. C.) News; J. M. Blalock, Spartanburg (S. C.) News; A. F. Ballentine, Greenville (S. C.) News; W. F. Pruett, Wilmington (N. C.) Star; W. T. Buck, Durham (N. C.) Sun; B. L. T. Cooper, Charleston (S. C.) Post and News-Courier; H. M. Brandon, Charlotte (N. C.) Observer; E. J. L. Ervin, Columbia (S. C.) State; and J. K. Hughes, Columbia (S. C.) Record.

Florida circulation managers are going to form an association of their own, it was decided by a group of delegates from that state attending the I. C. M. A. convention last week. An organization meeting will be held at Orlando, Fla., Aug. 25.

Among organizers of the proposed new group are: Frank Stanford, Orlando (Fla.) Sentinel; Don Davis, Tampa Tribune; James Brooks, Tampa Times; V. A. Bridges, Miami News; Fred Grim, Jacksonville Journal; Charles Potter, Lakeland Ledger; Glenn F. Felger, Palm Beach Post; Fred L. Hafer, Jacksonville Times-Union; C. L. Purvis, Orlando Reporter-Star.

A motion was made by J. M. Annenberg, Philadelphia Public Ledger at the Atlanta convention last week to have James M. Farley, circulation manager of the old Philadelphia North American, elected an honorary member of I. C. M. A. Mr. Farley has retired from newspaper work and is now a realtor. He was for more than 20 years an I. C. M. A. member, and is also a former director of the association. The motion was referred to the directors.

Roy Hatton, Detroit Free Press, has been wearing P. T. Barnum's shoes, and those who found it out last week lost their surprise that the former energetic president of I. C. M. A. suddenly became ill.

It is no easy task to put on a circus, and that was just about what Hatton did early last month when the Free Press staged its annual championships and 220,000 school children, parents and teachers watched 24,000 registered contestants compete for city championship honors in the largest field meet ever held.

The meet was arranged by the Health Education Department of the Detroit Public Schools and sponsored and financed by the Free Press. Entrants from schools in Wyandotte, Fordson, River Rouge, Highland Park, Hamtramck, Warren Township, South Lake, Halfway and Melvindale participated with city schools. Four hundred tents provided headquarters for teams from 290 schools. Nine hundred officials, starters, judges and clerks directed the competitions which followed a set program with the events synchronized. Silver trophies and banners were awarded to schools winning city and league championships. Individual winners in all classes in all events received gold, silver and bronze medals and prizes cameras, gold watches, pens, silk umbrellas and athletic goods, suitable to age of the contestant.

CIRCULATORS WERE REINDEER COWBOYS IN CHRISTMAS PROMOTION STUNT

Creating Atmosphere by Importing Santa's Steeds Built Goodwill but Not Circulation, Those Who Did It Agree—But, There Were Wild Times Taming the Animals

JULY is the hot time to think about Christmas, those who planned the program of the recent convention of the International Circulation Managers believed, and, accordingly they assigned L. J. Hoffman, St. Louis Star, and Seth J. Moore, Brooklyn Eagle, to talk about Yuletide promotion. Both concentrated on what has come to be called the "Reindeer Plan," offering their answers to the question "When Is a Circulation Manager a Reindeer Cowboy?"

If you want to spend lots of money, build goodwill, and experience the thrills that come once in a lifetime, the Reindeer Plan is the best plan for Christmas promotion, the speakers agreed, both of them saying it did not increase circulation.

Hoffman said:

"The 'Reindeer Plan,' although it is sold to increase circulation totals and advertising linage, in reality does very little of either. However, it produces goodwill in unlimited quantities, which no doubt at a later date, may reflect in your circulation total and advertising linage.

"The experience of the St. Louis Star was that it did not increase circulation, but was the responsible factor in maintaining its total, as there was very little difference in the December net paid as compared to November. Usually we experience a drop in December. In January the net paid total increased to the figures for October, which was the World Series month, and each month since the total has increased, but of course, we cannot attribute this increase to the reindeer plan, but the goodwill plan secured helped somewhat in these later months.

"There is no doubt about the reindeer plan being purely good will and the amount you can cash in on depends entirely upon how you work it and how much of the publisher's cash you are allowed to spend. The plan itself costs plenty, and the promotion will cost twice as much. In fact, we are still having expense as a result of this undertaking.

"I took it upon myself to write to a number of circulation managers from coast to coast asking each of them the same questions in reference to the plan, with the following results:

"1. Did the reindeer plan increase your circulation? If so, how much?

"To this question nine answered No. To the second part of the question, nine answered none. Two papers did not answer this question.

"Every circulation manager who used this stunt anticipating a circulation increase was very firm in answering No.

"2. Did your advertising department obtain extra linage as a result of this advertising? If so, how much?

"Answering this question three newspapers answered yes, six no, two not answering.

"Answering the second part of question, one paper obtained 20,000 extra lines of advertising; one paper received three pages of bank advertising; one paper obtained 17 special pages of neighborhood advertising.

"3. In your estimation, do you think that the reindeer plan helped the advertising department more than the circulation?

"In answering this question five papers answered yes, four answered that it helped neither; two papers failed to answer this question.

"4. Do you think that the good will created by this plan was worth the expenditure to obtain same?

"To the above question five newspapers answered yes, four doubtful, and two very doubtful.

"5. Will you repeat the Reindeer Plan in 1927? If so, are there any new features you are thinking of adding?

"The above question, in my estimation, is the most important of all to the circulation managers who are trying to decide whether or not to put on this plan for his newspaper.

"Two papers answered yes to this question; three no, and six doubtful.

"It might be interesting to mention here, that when the Reindeer Plan was sold to the Star, a certain newspaper was supposed to have obtained 22,000 net paid increase, of which 17,000 stayed permanent as a direct result of the Reindeer Plan; in fact the order department of this particular paper was forced to stay open twenty-four hours a day to handle the flood of subscriptions. This newspaper failed to answer the questionnaire."

A more detailed description of how one paper put on the plan was furnished by Mr. Moore of the Eagle. He said:

"Last year the Brooklyn Eagle engaged in a new proposition that gave us more cause for worry and greater thrills than anything we have tackled for a long time. We contracted for an Eskimo and seven deer to be used in a Santa Claus stunt in Brooklyn and Long Island. The deer were to be trained and broken to harness and we imagined when they arrived in New York all we would have to do would be to hitch them up and drive off.

"Two weeks before our published arrival of Santa Claus, the deer arrived in New York and were the wildest set of animals I have ever seen. We took them to a farm outside the city limits and told the Eskimo to go ahead and pacify them. After he had been at it a week we went to inspect the results of his efforts and found that nothing had been accomplished and that four of the deer had broken loose the night before and were roaming over the golf courses of Westchester County. After we offered rewards and called the whole countryside to our assistance, we finally drove the deer into Long Island Sound and went after them with motor boats and lassoed them in the water.

"For about six weeks prior to Santa's arrival in Brooklyn, we ran propaganda on the front page of the paper calling attention to his deer coming to Brooklyn and published daily dispatches from him in his trip across the continent. The interest was very great but the public was a litle suspicious that his arrival would not be as realistic as we pictured it in the articles.

"A very elaborate sleigh was built with concealed wheels and we had a fancy harness and bells for the deer. We were fortunate in obtaining the services of a trained actor and we had the best make-up and clothes that money could buy. When he made his triumphal entry into Brooklyn the enthusiasm surpassed our greatest expectations.

"We placed in the public park in the center of the city a log cabin covered with tinsel and had colored lights on it at night. We also had an igloo built for the Eskimo. The deer were placed in the log hut and hundreds of thousands of people came to visit them.

"The deer became very tame and we would take them and Santa Claus each day to various sections of the city. They became so gentle that we were able to take them up and down stairs, through hospital wards beside the beds and into Sunday School classes. As time went on the demands for the deer became so great that we had to assign one person to the telephone to do nothing but turn down requests.

"We made a five-day excursion out into the country with Santa and his deer. In the various towns and in the outlying sections the reaction was even greater than that in the city. Parents brought their children distances of 40 and 50 miles to see the animals and Santa Claus and his deer were entertained by Elks Clubs, Chambers of Commerce and other organizations all along the line. In practically every town where we showed the deer they told us they had had the largest crowd in the history of the town and we have several letters from merchants stating that they had done the largest day's business in their history.

"In order to make a direct tie-up we distributed cards to the children.

"If any of you are considering bringing the reindeer to your town, I would suggest that you first get your whole organization absolutely sold on it and make up your minds that it is going to be a lot of hard work. You are going to commit yourselves in the paper weeks ahead and when the time comes the deer must be there and ready to go on.

"For this reason I would suggest that you arrange with some one whom you know is able to ship to you at the proper time and in the proper condition. Reindeer live in their native land on moss and it is only a very small percentage that can be trained to the feed available in the States.

"I suppose the thing you are most interested in is its effect on circulation. I am not in a position to quote anything very tangible in this respect. All I have to say is that the circulation growth last year and this year has been satisfactory and healthy.

"We received hundreds of thousands of letters directed to the Eagle and in addition to that we arranged with the Post Office to turn over all letters addressed to Santa Claus. All of these were answered by us and we know of nothing in our history that brought the Eagle closer to the hearts of so many people in so short a time. While we cannot write the results in figures, we are satisfied and are looking forward with great anticipation to a repetition of the same stunt this year."

NEWSPAPER LIBRARY GROUP ELECTS

Miss Agnes Petersen of Milwaukee Journal Named Chairman of Toronto Succeeding William Alcott of Boston Globe

The fifth annual conference of Newspaper Librarians of the United States and Canada was held at the King Edward Hotel, Toronto, on June 20 and 21 under the auspices of the Newspaper Group of the Special Libraries Association.

At the business session the following officers were elected: Chairman, Miss Agnes J. Petersen, librarian of the Milwaukee Journal; vice-chairman, Maurice Symonds, librarian of the New York Daily News; secretary-treasurer, Miss Marie Anne Walker, librarian, New York Times. Miss Petersen succeeds William Alcott of the Boston Globe.

Twenty-three librarians attended. Some of the most prominent members of the association were prevented from attending, including John Miller, librarian of King Features Syndicate, New York, chairman of the group, and Joseph F. Kwapil of the Philadelphia Public Ledger, its founder. One of the first acts of the group was to send a message of greeting to these members expressing regret at their absence. Miss Agnes J. Petersen, vice-chairman of the group, presided at the meetings.

Mr. Miller sent his report on the notable events of the year in newspaper library history, and this was read by Miss Petersen.

Joseph F. Kwapil presented a supplementary report on the subject of "Standard Classification of Newspaper Clippings."

Lee A. White, editorial executive of the Detroit News, was prevented from attending, but his address on "What the Editorial Executive Expects of the Newspaper Library," was read by Ford M. Pettit, librarian of that paper.

At the end of the first session an open forum and question box was conducted by William Alcott, librarian of the Boston Globe. The matter of a code of ethics received much attention and it was voted to have such a code prepared.

Letters of greeting were received from Jack Black of the San Francisco Call, C. Fred Cook, Washington Star, Paul J. Foster, Philadelphia Inquirer, David C. Rogers, New York Herald Tribune, and Floyd Miller, Royal Oak, Mich.

The second session was held on Tuesday afternoon. Miss Agnes J. Petersen of the Milwaukee Journal as chairman of the committee on methods, presented the results of a questionnaire which was sent last spring to 380 newspaper libraries in the United States and Canada, and of whom 70 responded, giving the largest body of material on newspaper libraries ever assembled.

Thorwald Solberg, Register of Copyrights, of Washington, D. C., gave an address on "Newspaper Copyright with Some Practical Suggestions," and followed this with answers to eight prepared questions on various angles of the copyright law.

Bernard K. Sandwell, of the Montreal Star, gave an address on "Canadian Journalism and the Newspaper Library."

Among those who attended the sessions were R. R. Bowker, publisher of the Library Journal; and William D. Harper of New York.

The Special Libraries Association elected the following officers: Francis E. Cady, president, Nela Park, Cleveland; Mary Louise Alexander, vice-president, Barton, Durstine & Osborn, New York; Miss Rose Vormelker, secretary-treasurer, librarian of the White Motor Company, Cleveland; Miss Caroline Voltemayer, second vice-president. Rapid Transit Company, Philadelphia; Board: Byron E. Edwards, Standard Oil Company of Cal.; William Alcott, Boston Globe.

SHOP TALK AT THIRTY

By MARLEN PEW

HORACE Greeley started the New York Tribune in 1841 on a thousand dollars of borrowed money and the going was up-hill and perilous until the ill-advised management of the New York Sun of those days decided that the way to kill off the new rival was to hire away its delivery boys, beat them up when obstinate and if any street newsie was caught selling a Tribune his supply of Suns was instantly cut off. The Tribune was a fighting paper from the start and Greeley took the quarrel to the public. Whereas he had been finding it difficult to "give away our edition of 5,000", paid subscriptions started to pour in at the rate of 300 a day and the Tribune began its second year with 12,000 paid subscribers and a daily average of 13 columns of advertising in a field of twelve dailies. The Sun had inadvertently put the new paper on the map, giving Greeley opportunity to express his wonderful qualities of mind and soul.

THE other day Tom Gerber, of United Press, kindly loaned to this writer, ever worshipper at the Greeley shrine, a tattered and mildewed book which he had picked up years ago at an obscure bookstall. It is dated 1854 and the author is J. Parton, a painstaking and eloquent writer who made a study of Greeley's character and career and published the biography when the pioneer was at the height of his fame. Herein lies a series of revelations concerning the grandeur of the old giant's philosophy and editorial skill.

Horace Greeley's body weighed 145 pounds, his shoulders were badly bent, complexion light and his head, measured around the bumps of individuality and philoprogenitiveness, was 23½ inches in circumference, the forehead a full, round dome that would attract attention in any audience. While orderly in his work, he was awkward in manner and one of the worst-dressed men New York journalism ever saw, wearing clothes that hung like bags, his usually unfastened stockings often falling down over his shoes and all topped off by a white overcoat which Greeley bought from an immigrant who happened to need money when the editor needed a coat. He was often seen in Broadway with holes in his elbows and straws clinging to his hat. At home and in the office he was agreeable, even lovable, a good listener and a lively talker, at times humorous. He was a late riser, but a marvelous hustler once he got started. He often attracted attention at concerts or theatres by going to sleep. He was without fear, but no braggart. Through all his years in daily journalism he averaged more than 3 columns of original writing per day, and frequently delivered page stories on subjects which he would himself report.

BETWEEN his sixth and tenth years, this biographer declares, Greeley passionately read the Bible from Genesis to Revelations, Pilgrim's Progress and many other books and was notable because he could spell "any word." Leaving his New England home he found his way to New York and his early journalistic struggles were crowned by his daring issuance of the daily Tribune. Greeley was militant and all of his battles were for the under-dog. In 1838 he had witnessed the heartbreaking miseries of the poor in a panic. That thousands of good men were jobless and their families in need of food, clothing and fuel aroused in Greeley indignation that such social injustice could prevail. This bitterness endured throughout his life. He was greatly influenced by Albert Brisbane, Arthur Brisbane's brilliant father who, shortly before, had brought from Paris, where he had been a student, the fascinating socialistic theories of Fourier. Brisbane believed that Fourier's dream could be realized in unshackled America and began zealously to propagandize the new social scheme. He converted Greeley and the latter made no secret of the fact. When the Tribune was started, Brisbane was one of Greeley's closest friends. Toward the end of the first year of the newspaper's life Greeley launched the Fourier idea in the columns of the Tribune and permitted Brisbane to have his full say there. This led to terrific onslaughts from rival New York newspapers and also London Times. Greeley's native sagacity taught him that before Fourierism could be realized a complete revolution in public sentiment must be effected and that this would require many years, but nevertheless he wrote on the subject in a spirit of confidence and gave big space to a joint debate on socialism, he himself defending the issue. In later years, while never backing down on his radicalism, Greeley was usually found in the position of moderator or conciliator of the "right" and "left" wings of thought on the social and economic questions of the day.

GREELEY once wrote: "Let me remind you that there is need of a new social system, when the old one works so villanously and wastefully. There is Ireland, with 300,000 able-bodied men, willing to work, yet unemployed! Their labor is worth forty-five millions a year, which they need, and Ireland needs, but which the present social system dooms to waste. There is work enough in Ireland to do, and men willing enough to do it; but the spell of the vicious social system broods over the island and keeps the workmen and the work apart. Four centuries ago the English laborer could earn by his labor a good and sufficient subsistence for his family. Since that time Labor and Talent have made England rich 'beyond the dreams of avarice'; and, at this day, the laborer as a rule cannot, by unremitting toil, fully supply the necessities of his family. His bread is coarse, his clothing scanty, his home a hovel, his children uninstructed, his life cheerless. He lives from hand to mouth in abject terror of the poor-house where, he shudders to think, he must end his days. Precisely the same causes are in operation here, and in due time will produce precisely the same effects. There is need of a social re-formation."

ONE of the funny stories concerns Greeley and J. Fenimore Cooper, author of the Leatherstocking novels. Cooper, it appears, hated the press and was forever rowing with editors. Greeley commented on the fact that Cooper had three libel issues before the Circuit Court sitting at Saratoga; that the jury in one of these cases had awarded Cooper $400 damages and "the value of Mr. Cooper's character, therefore has been judicially ascertained—it is worth exactly four hundred dollars." Greeley also stressed the fact that the $400 judgment was awarded through a default, the defendant, Mr. Weed of the Albany Evening Journal, having refused to come to court because of the illness of his daughter. Cooper, of course, immediately sued Greeley for $3,000 and the editor went to Saratoga to defend the case in person. He employed no lawyer and, although he had never before been in the Circuit Court and had never studied law, he proceeded to give Cooper a drubbing. However, the court opened on Greeley all of the batteries of technicality and despite the editor's withering remarks about the sly tricks of law, contravening an honest exposition of the facts at issue, the judge advised the jury of the undoubted fact that by pleading "not guilty," under the law, Greeley had admitted guilt and that the only business of the jury was to assess the damages. Greeley had much fun with this situation in court and, of course, finally fell back upon an attempt to prove justification. The jury, practically under the direction of the court, gave Cooper a verdict, but for only $200, and Greeley rushed back to New York and put into the Tribune a story of his experiences, 9 columns long, which for humor, acid sarcasm and complete exposition of the absurdities that underlie legal pomposity has no counterpart in journalism. The editor bought a great story cheaply. Some 200 newspapers copied his yarn and not only New York but the whole country had a great laugh. Of course, Cooper sued again but Greeley spoofed him out of it by repeated allusions to literary men who could not fight with their pens but must resort to the tricks of the law.

GREELEY was preeminently a maker of good and voluminous copy. He was forever writing and on every conceivable subject. But facts had to be there—he was no dreamer or drooler. He would grind out a news story or a pat editorial on call, but to many of his articles he gave months of preparation. All of his writing was done in pen and ink on foolscap sheets and samples of it certainly prove that it could easily be the despair of any printer. However, Samuel Rosenthal, who prints EDITOR & PUBLISHER, down in William street, near Brooklyn Bridge, tells me that as a boy in the Tribune's proof-room he had the Greeley chirography solved to a nicety and there was rarely a night that he was not called on to tell some printer what some Greeley scrawl spelled. Greeley was one of the old-timers who never knew when to quit and go home. Yet he never appeared to be foolishly obsessed, like some folks we know.

I HAVE been most interested in reading Greeley's little human-interest editorials about the metropolis and its people of that time. Each is from 100 to 300 words. The man's heart was on his sleeve in these essays. He wanted people to be happy in this world—the life beyond the grave did not concern him. He wanted fathers to have good incomes and spend them for the material and cultural benefits of their families. Everyone should have a good home. There should be no slum. Every child should have equal and ample educational advantages. People should reverence their bodies and protect health. "Pay as you go" was a principle always stressed. Seeking to elevate the negro, Greeley said to the race: "Step aside from those who insult and degrade you, buy a tract of land which shall be your own and * * * claim the privileges of manhood." The free press has had no stouter defender and Greeley would fight at the drop of the hat for any liberal cause. Of the old-time editors he abused the free press privilege perhaps as little as anyone. His life plea in The Tribune was for the poor and weak; the rich and powerful might look elsewhere for defenders. What he wrote to aspiring young men, in this day often misquoted, was as follows:

"'I want to go into business,' is the aspiration of our young men: 'can't you find me a place in the city?' their constant inquiry. 'Friend,' we answer to many, 'the best business you can go into you will find on your father's farm or in his workshop. If you have no family or friends to aid you, and no prospect opened to you there, turn your face to the Great West, and there build up a home and fortune. But dream not of getting suddenly rich by speculation, rapidly by trade, or anyhow by a profession: All these avenues are choked by eager, struggling aspirants, and ten must be trodden down in the press where one can vault upon his neighbor's shoulders to honor or wealth. Above all, be neither afraid nor ashamed of honest industry; and if you catch yourself fancying anything more respectable than this, be ashamed of it to the last day of your life. Or, if you find yourself shaking more cordially the hand of your cousin the Congressman than of your uncle the blacksmith, as such, write yourself down an enemy to the principles of our institutions, and a traitor to the dignity of Humanity.'"

READERS THROUGH WITH BUNK

McKernon Discusses News Before Conference of Health Officers

"Honest news walks in the front door of the newspaper shop and is welcomed by the editor; subtle propaganda climbs up the fire escape and is thrown out the window," said Edward McKernon, superintendent of the eastern division of the Associated Press, Tuesday in addressing the annual conference of health officers and public health nurses.

"Newspaper readers are done with the bunk of yesterday and they look to science, not magic, for their maximum well being and enjoyment of life," said Mr. McKernon.

"Approach the press in the name of news," urged the speaker, "for that is your only claim to space in the strictly news column."

OHIO DAILY'S ENTRANT WINS SPELLING BEE

Dean Lucas, Representing Akron Beacon-Journal Is Champion—Des Moines Register Entrant Wins Second Prize

Dean Lucas, 13-year-old West Salem, O., boy, as the entrant of the Akron Beacon Journal, won $1,000 in gold, the first prize in the third annual National Spelling Bee held in the National Museum Auditorium, Washington, D. C., Friday, June 24, under the auspices of the Louisville (Ky.) Courier-Journal and 16 associated newspapers.

Under a cross fire of words lasting three hours, Ralph Keenan, also 13, of Waukon, Ia., entrant of the Des Moines Register, was forced to accept second honors, and $500 in gold, when he spelled the word abrogate "a-b-r-e-g-a-t-e." Abrogate held no terrors for young Lucas.

Minerva Ressler, New Holland, Pa., entrant of the Lancaster New Era, and Margaret Ross, Fancy Farm, Ky., entrant of the Louisville Courier-Journal, were third and fourth respectively.

Donald McWain, of the Louisville Courier-Journal, was director of the "bee." Associated with him was Lorenzo W. Martin, of the Washington bureau of the same paper.

The judges, Mrs. Joshua A. Evans, a trustee of George Washington University; Alvin W. Miller, principal of the Central High School, and Rev. James Shera Montgomery, chaplain of the U. S. House of Representatives, were often forced to consult reference dictionaries for accepted spellings and pronunciations, so adept did the contestants prove.

Young Lucas, an eighth grade graduate of a rural school, had defeated representatives of 70,000 children to win the spelling championship of his State. Young Keenan, who finished second, a student at a school nine miles from his home town, had defeated 98 county champions to win the Iowa title.

The spellers who finished after the winning "big four" were Margaret Beale, the Atlantic City (N. J.) Press; Chester Wilcox, Binghamton (N. Y.) Press; Hulda Fornell, Detroit News; Anita McCloskey, Erie (Pa.) Dispatch-Herald; Virginia Jones, Fort Worth (Tex.) Press; Lillian Zetoff, Hartford (Conn.) Times; Mildred Riddle, Indianapolis Times; Dorothy O'Reilly, Memphis Press-Scimitar; Marjorie Allen, New Bedford (Conn.) Standard; Marie Hahn, New Britain (Conn.) Daily Herald; Anna Marie Bergen, South Bend (Ind.) News-Times; Grace Helen Sherman, Trenton (N. J. RANKEN TOWSE, 82, RETIRES FROM NEW YORK POST HE JOINED AT 25

Dean of New York Dramatic Critics Spent His Working Life of 57 Years on Same Daily—Was City Editor Seventeen Years

FIFTY-SEVEN years ago a young man of twenty-five, just two years out of Cambridge and in this country less than a year, joined the staff of the New York Evening Post.

On June 24, J. Ranken Towse retired, the oldest member of this paper's staff. But prouder to him is the distinction of having been, for 54 full years, dramatic critic of the Evening Post—an unparalleled journalistic record.

For the last few years he has shared his critical labors, and for many years after he was first made critic he performed, in addition, the tasks of reporter, city editor, assistant editor and foreign editor, but disregarding these circumstances, the one fact stands out that for half a century and more he has observed the world's theatre and reported for the Post his observations and reactions.

Mr. Towse was eighty-two on April 2 last, and although his health is still excellent the Evening Post decided that his years of service had earned him the right to leisure and to a pension.

At present he is at Bonnie View, his country home in the hills of Sullivan County, near Lewbeach, but it is his plan to return sooner or later to England. He was born there, in Streatham, Surrey, in 1845.

Mr. Towse came to this country in 1869 after his graduation from Cambridge Both at the university and at the Highgate School, where he had prepared, he had led an active athletic life. It was his knowledge of rowing that made him an unusual asset to the Post when he first joined it.

Rowing, collegiate rowing, was then in its infancy. Mr. Towse was assigned to cover one of the first regattas, then held on Saratoga Lake.

His account of how he "upset the dope" on what crew would win is amusing in the light of the publicity now surrounding college sports.

Harvard and Yale, where rowing was fairly well established, were picked by the majority to be the most likely to win.

Mr. Towse, however, decided to get first hand information. He chartered a horse and buggy, drove up in the woods lining the shores and there, in hiding, clocked the crews at their practice.

"The Post was so startled by the story I sent down to them," he said, "that they didn't want to use it at first. But they did, and when my prediction that Cornell would win was verified by the result of the race I found myself with somewhat of a reputation as a rowing expert."

Journalism in those days had not reached the stage of specialization, and the young reporter found his duties manifold.

He had obtained his job by bringing in to Charles Nordhoff, then managing editor, a series of articles exposing the disgraceful conditions on Blackwell's Island, now Welfare Island and still a city prison.

This was printed in the face of Tammany Hall's fury, and Mr. Towse was put to work, designated as an "unattached reporter." Later, as city editor he covered the famous trial of Henry Ward Beecher and tells how the reporters, while the jury was out, cast a secret and unanimous ballot declaring their belief the noted gospeller was innocent of the charges of misconduct laid to him. He covered the Westfield ferryboat disaster, the Tweed ring exposures and was the first reporter admitted to the scene of the celebrated Nathan murder case.

As city editor for seventeen years he "held down the desk," covering important assignments, in addition to his editorial tasks. Later he added the tasks of editing the Post's foreign and other correspondence, and evenutally E. L. Godkin, then editor-in-chief, raised him to the position of assistant managing editor.

Through most of these busy years—since late in 1873, in fact—Mr. Towse had also served as dramatic editor, and this, perhaps, was his consuming interest.

At the start, he adopted this credo: "Never know an actor or actress if it can be helped. Never accept a personal communication from a manager. Never ask for a pass or any other favor."

"I've stuck to that pretty well," he reflected. "It's true I've had one or two very close friends in the theatre—Daniel Frohman and William Seymour—and I've met a few others now and then through the years, old John Drew, for instance, but I've held with fair success to my resolve to have no embarrassing friendships which might influence my critical viewpoint.

"I've always regarded the theatre as one of civilization's great educational forces. That is why I denounce the present condition of the stage, destitute of morality as it is."

It saddens Mr. Towse that the end of his critical career, fifty-four years of battling for the stage's betterment, should find the stage at what he believes is its lowest estate in more than a century.

He regrets, to, his retirement from the newspaper which has been his only employer.

"It must be almost needless to add," he wrote in his formal letter of retirement, "that my parting, even at my own volition, from a journal with which the whole of my working life has been associated, is a source of reflections which are not altogether gay.

"But in my newly bestowed freedom I hope to find full compensation for vain regrets."

GARSTIN GETS LIFE

Newspaper Man Given Drastic Sentence Under Baumes Law

Because of the New York state Baumes law and despite pleas for leniency for him by friends, Bert N. Garstin, former Louisville and Cleveland newspaper man, was this week sentenced to life imprisonment in New York by Judge Levine as a fourth offender found guilty of a swindling charge.

Mr. Garstin, after serving a term in Maryland penitentiary, had worked his way up to business manager of the Louisville Herald-Post. On Feb. 2, this year, in New York, he went to the office of John J. H. Hyde of the Detroit Company, and, pretending that he wanted to buy securities, induced Mr. Hyde to accompany him to the New York Trust Company, where he opened an account with a $50,000 draft on the Union Trust Company of Cleveland. He then persuaded Mr. Hyde to indorse his check for $300 on the National Bank of Kentucky. The check came back for lack of funds and it developed that Garstin had no account at the Cleveland bank.

Mr. Garstin's plea that he thought his salary from the Herald-Post was being deposited in the bank won a clemency recommendation from the jury which found him guilty, but Assistant District Attorney Thomas A. Aurelio said Garstin had been convicted several times, and if the present conviction is his fourth for a felony, a life sentence would be mandatory under the Baumes law.

His attorney, George R. Simpson, called the judge's attention to the fact that his client had lived in an exemplary manner since he was pardoned from the Maryland prison in 1914. A number of advertising men appeared to testify that the newspaper man had been honest during his dealings with them extending over a period of more than five years.

REAL ESTATE GROUP FIGHTING BILLBOARDS

National Association of Real Estate Boards Recommends Their Elimination from Highways and Public Property

Elimination of billboards and advertising signs within the limits of all public highways and from all public property was advocated in proposals approved this week by the executive committee of the National Association of Real Estate Boards.

The proposals are now being submitted to the 657 member boards of the association for their discussion.

They follow in full:

"City billboards in the commercial or industrial districts may, under definite control, be conceded a place in our business life.

"The National Association of Real Estate Boards, favors the elimination of all advertising signs within the limits of all public highways and on all public property except signs relating to the use of such public property.

"We disapprove of the use of overhanging signs on public thoroughfares, in business districts or elsewhere.

"We recommend the elimination of all billboards as advertising signs in rural sections where they destroy the beauty of the scenery or the charm of the landscape, and to this end we ask the cooperation of all realtors and of all billboard companies in refraining from placing billboards in such sections; we further recommend that if necessary, legislation be enacted by the various states to secure the elimination of billboards in such sections.

"We urge the elimination of signs tacked to trees, or painted or pasted on telegraph poles, fences and the like, or, in rural districts, painted on rocks. The observance of this recommendation is particularly urged upon those who aspire to public office."

DISTRIBUTING PROMOTION COPY

Six brief essays on "The Value of a Newspaper To Its Community," written by J. W. Shaw, secretary of the New York Press Association, have been printed in leaflet form and sent to members for use as promotion boxes.

THE KIND OF COOPERATION ADVERTISERS WANT

use as a means of producing business for them. Sell an idea primarily, and let the advertiser sell his merchandise.

To proceed with the suggestions; here they are, about in the order in which they are mentioned:

"Good position is the best sort of cooperation." To amplify this, a tire manufacturer objects to having his copy on the woman's page; a food products manufacturer doesn't want to be in the financial section, and so on.

Intelligent surveys of local market conditions.

Teach dealers sound merchandising methods.

Keep route lists up to date.

To tell you the truth, I had an idea that advertisers weren't doing a whole lot of definite thinking on this subject of so-called merchandising service, and that when they thought of cooperation, they thought of a lot of things of far broader application than merely the so-called merchandising work you are doing.

Which brings us to the last question asked, in which we gave them a chance to go the limit. The question simply was: "Any other suggestions for making newspaper advertising more profitable to the advertiser?" As you may judge, there were plenty of replies, and many of them bring us right back to the questions which I discussed in the early part of this paper. It is difficult to summarize these replies, but I can list a few of the most popular subjects, and then I am going to read you a few extracts from some of the statements. Perhaps the best summary of the situation is contained in this extract from one of the replies:

"No newspaper should offer a merchandising service which is not an honest service. Such service should be offered only on products or merchandise which are known to be right. Merely sending out a crew of youngsters who know far less about advertising, merchandising, and selling than the retailer himself, hurts instead of helps both newspaper and advertiser.

"To my mind the first job of the newspaper is to produce a paper which merits the respect and confidence of the largest possible percentage of its readers. This can only be done by the right kind of editorial policy, by clean news columns, by good layout and typography (eliminating cheap illustrations, intensive black heads, and poorly displayed merchandise). If the product or merchandise is right, if the market is right, and the medium is right, the matter of merchandising can well be left to the advertiser and little if any cooperation along this line is necessary from the newspaper except where a thorough-going and well-established merchandising organization has been built up to a point where it commands the confidence of the retailer."

This seems almost like a summary of the many replies received, nearly all of which bear on the suggestions of this gentleman. Here are some of the others:

Better editorial and advertising make-up.

Cut out enforced combinations.

Clean up circulation methods and quit going after big circulations.

Re-instate cash discount.

Equalize local and national rates on a fair basis.

Publish a paper which will insure reader interest and merit acceptance by both the trade and the public.

More good reading matter near advertising.

Classify linage according to a uniform set of standards.

Stop supplying misleading figures, particularly regarding classification of linage.

Improve the quality, not the quantity, of circulation.

Give the advertiser an even break, and let him do the rest. And now let me quote a few more brief remarks from various classes of industries, and I am through. Here's one who says:

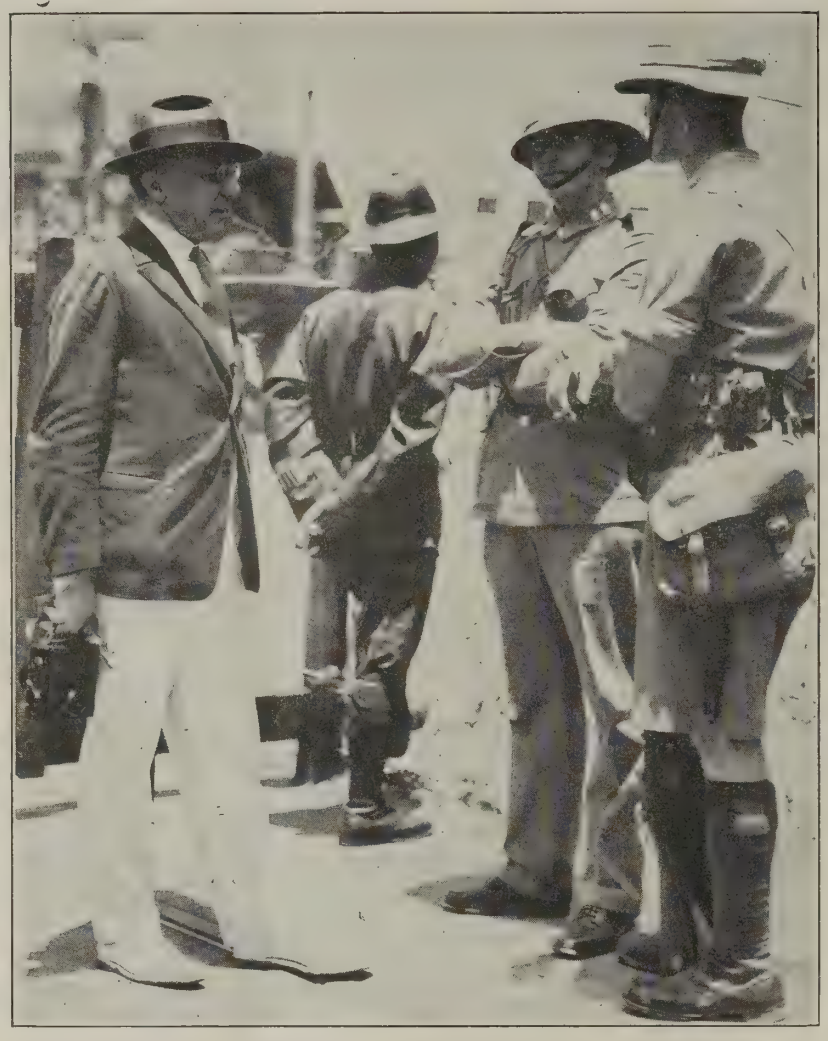
"Generally we believe it (referring to merchandising cooperation) is over-sold and over-worked. The dealer is bombarded with mail and personal calls until his attitude is 'what of it, and who cares?' We accept cooperation because we know we're paying for it anyway."

Another: "The newspaper policy should be sufficiently flexible to meet the peculiar requirements of each advertiser without placing undue burden on the newspapers. Newspapers should look at themselves from the advertiser's viewpoint, attempting to make their medium the ideal link between the advertiser and the market. The constant weakness among the newspapers is this infernal drive for more and more circulation that is of less and less value to the advertiser."

Still another: "Cut out the cooperation and give the advertiser a rate based solely upon A.B.C. figures. Do away with arbitrary combination rates. Each unit should stand on its own merit. All newspaper circulations should be subject to scrutiny of the A.B.C."

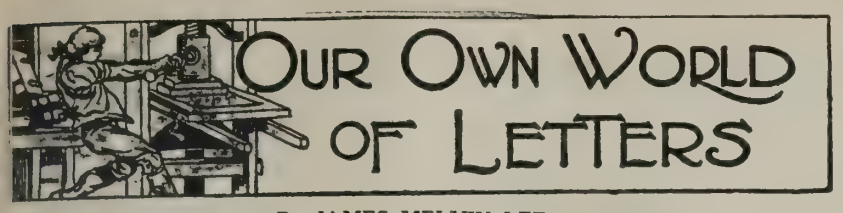
Another: "Newspaper advertising is most valuable when the paper has an editorial make-up that prompts a thorough reading, when the quality of reader interest is 100 per cent, when circulation methods are sound, and when the paper possesses what is known as trade and consumer acceptance."

Another: "Cut it all out and give us a lower rate and better newspapers so people will read them and see our ads. All this so-called cooperation is really only increased selling cost which we must pay."



Another: "Newspapers might talk sound advertising practice to dealers instead of trying to get them to participate in special editions and trying to persuade them that the amount of space planned by the factory is not adequate."

There are many more, of course, but they are largely repetitions of the same ideas expressed in a little different way. Perhaps you feel that as the representative of the advertiser I have taken unfair advantage of you in being a sort of calamity howler; I came here to talk about cooperation that pays both of us and I have talked largely on what doesn't pay us. At our last convention C. F. Kettering, the great research expert of General Motors, said that the job of research is to find out what is wrong, and then start from there. I feel somewhat better in view of that statement. Perhaps I have given you a starting point. What do advertisers want that you can give them to your profit as well as ours? If I analyze these answers correctly, they want first of all a good newspaper. They want sound circulation, soundly built. They want it in the trading area where it belongs. They want it priced on the same intelligent basis of cost and profit as their merchandise. They want good readers, who really read the paper because they are interested in it. They want clean make-up and typography that will give their advertising a chance for attention. They want the option of choosing their own media, without forced combinations and without inspired solicitations from dealers. They want to know about your local market, of course, and they want such merchandising cooperation as can be intelligently offered to all advertisers, and sincerely carried out, but not the prevalent kind that is so often used as a smoke screen for unprofitable circulation, bad make-up, and worse news. In sort, they want an advertising medium which is a profitable link between the factory and the local market, and they want such real help in making their advertising pay as you can profitably give them at no greater cost than they can obtain it otherwise.



Get back to our first subject—the cost of distribution. Is it going up or down for advertisers in your paper? Is your own selling cost going up or down? That's our barometer. We must drive it downward, in your business and in ours. From the editors' viewpoint and from the publishers' viewpoint, perhaps newspapers are primarily a great servant of the public, for disseminating information and opinion. But their scope has become much broader than that, and today to you and to me they are an indispensable arm of distribution. Shall they remain indispensable? Only so long as they offer the most economical means of selling in their local markets. Build a sound newspaper, keep it a virile influence in your community, analyze and sell it honestly, know your market thoroughly and help us to know it and win it according to our ability and merit, cut out the frills and obvious tricks of salesmanship and give us the best value you can afford, and I assure you that if I read the signs aright, these are the soundest forms of cooperation you can give.

We are at your service; we seek to cooperate with you and seek your cooperation; we offer you the combined opinion of the leading national advertisers, obtained without prejudice, on all matters of moment to all of us. What we want, after all, is more productive advertising—a purpose which challenges the best of us to cooperate with the best that is in us.

By JAMES MELVIN LEE

WHENEVER the American newspaper comes up for discussion in a public forum some criticism is sure to be made of the way the press prints news of crime. About the sanest thing that has appeared from the pen of any editor on this subject is the pamphlet, "Newspapers and Crime Prevention" by Charles M. Dennis, editor of the Chicago Daily News. It is based on his experiences with good-government movements in Chicago for a period of over 45 years.

After discussing crime prevention from the public point of view, Mr. Dennis thus sets forth the situation from the press angle:

> From the newspaper's point of view it is chiefly in setting forth their issues in local campaigns and so trying to induce voters for their own and the city's good to go to the polls in exceptionally large numbers and otherwise interest themselves effectively in obtaining honest government that the newspaper can be helpful in the prevention of crime. Is it not worth the public's while to try to gauge the sincerity of the newspapers that profess to represent their interests in matters of general public concern?

Mr. Dennis then discusses the delays of the courts and the various efforts to defeat justice, both of which have considerable news interest. He then makes the following comment:

> Because of the public's direct interest in the struggle, the press must record the various moves, as these are worked out in the courts. Thus arises the familiar charge that the press revels in crime news, that it sensationalizes and exploits all manner of social uncleanliness, and that consequently it corrupts youth and transforms innocence into cynical sophistication or worse. This charge, which comes with particular frequency and fervor from women's clubs, though it is also a favorite with crusading lawyers, is, I believe, almost invariably brought against the newspaper press as a whole. Sometimes it is so phrased that the press is made to appear a thing utterly evil, like the doomed cities of the plain, though the appropriate rain of fire and brimstone is unaccountably delayed.

Mr. Dennis next takes up somewhat in detail some of these charges which are brought against the press. The following quotation is a little long but it deserves circulation among laymen even more than among editors and publishers:

> Problems arising in the publication of crime news are studied all their lives by newspaper editors, who try to be good citizens, studied conscientiously and from many points of view. They discuss these problems in meetings of their state and national organizations, discuss them ethically, as becomes men who have a very real sense of their responsibility as disseminators of intelligence by the printed word. Just the other day the editor of a newspaper published in one of the cities in Tennessee wrote me to ask whether in my judgment his newspaper had done the right thing in publishing a certain crime story. A man well known in the city, after having occupied positions of trust for years, turned out to be an embezzler. The man had stolen during a considerable period, many thousands of dollars that had been instrusted to his care. The losers were more interested in getting back as much of the stolen money as possible than they were in prosecuting the thief. The latter, whom evil habits had led into expensive practices, promised to go straight and work faithfully and so try to make good his victim's losses. Accordingly it was arranged that there should be no prosecution, and that the man's peculations should be kept secret, in order that his standing in the community and his business reputation might not suffer, and thus bring about a reduction of his earning power. However, the local newspaper learned the facts and published the story. In view of the man's promised reformation and the opportunity that was given him to redeem his past offenses, was the newspaper's action right or wrong? The editor was troubled in his own mind about the matter. Though manifestly there was a variety of considerations to be weighed before the decision properly could be reached in the matter, in my judgment the editor's duty to his readers and to the community required him to publish the story.

Another topic which Mr. Dennis treats in his pamphlet is the handling of news recording criminal attacks upon young girls. In discussing this topic he frankly admits that "distorted pictures of crime and vice, because they are untruthful and therefore deceptive, are likely to prove distinctly demoralizing." Such sensationalism is bound to produce a stench that "destroys clean growths and leaves only abnormality and decay." Mention is made that relatively few American newspapers deliberately or intentionally overstep the bounds of decent restraint in dealing with news of vice and crime.

One of the most important comments made by Mr. Dennis is the following summary:

> It is the province of a newspaper to be as interesting as possible within the bounds of good taste and good morals. A newspaper exists only because it is a purveyor of news. If it ceases to publish the news in reasonably complete form, it presently ceases to exist, for the public dooms it to a swift or a lingering death, and rightly so. If it forms the habit of suppressing or garbling legitimate news, it cannot long survive, because its readers quickly lose confidence in it and will have none of it. But cannot all news of crime and other immorality be segregated in some relatively obscure compound on some back page of the newspaper, where those who want it can find it, and those who do not want it can pass it by? Not properly, in my judgment. News must be displayed in accordance with its relative interest or importance if readers are to be treated fairly. You cannot trifle with your readers. They are entitled to the best you have, which must be the best you can get. If any one supposes that the editor whose task it is to select the articles to put on the newspaper's first page, for example, is continually looking for crime news to put there, that person is mistaken. The editor, in fact, looks for the most interesting or the most important news of any sort with which to produce his display, and he is assiduously studying reader psychology while making his selections. The chances are that he is best satisfied when he succeeds in constructing a first page without any crime or scandal news upon it. Why, then, does he ever deny himself that satisfaction? Because he would be unfaithful to the newspaper's readers if he were to banish any news to a less conspicuous position in the newspaper if, judged by its legitimate reader interest, it is entitled to a first-page display.

In conclusion Mr. Dennis emphasizes the fact that the criticism that many people make against publication of crime news is a criticism against human nature. To prove this fact he calls attention to the popularity of adventure stories, detective tales, historical novels full of horror invented by the authors and even grand opera which mainly revolves around revolting crimes that spring from powerful human passions. Yet critics of the press do not criticize grand opera as demoralizing to youth. To show that exposure of crime makes for civic righteousness Mr. Dennis recalls what Don R. Mellett, when editor of the Daily News, accomplished in Canton, Ohio, and what Carl Magee of the Albuquerque State Tribune did to promote political purity in New Mexico.

Mr. Dennis has performed a useful service to the public by setting forth so succinctly sane and logical views on the topic that has caused so much debate. His pamphlet may be obtained from the Chicago Daily News, 15 North Wells street, Chicago, for twelve cents.

THE students in the Pulitzer School of Journalism put out an annual publication, The Columbia Journalist. The chairman of the editorial board for the 1927 issue is Jacob Hohenberg. Five students from the senior class and five students from the junior class have aided Mr. Hohenberg in the production of the volume.

As in past years the Columbia Journalist consists of the news stories, the feature stories, criticism and and reviews, which for the most part students in the Pulitzer School have marketed to various newspapers throughout the country. The section containing editorials doubtless represents the work of the class room of Professor Roscoe Conkling Brown.

A preface is contributed by J. W. Cunliffe, Director of the Pulitzer School. In this preface Director Cunliffe comments about the contents of the book as follows:

> It is not amateur work, but claims to be judged by professional standards, the articles having, for the most part, been offered to and accepted by the newspapers in the usual way by those who have written them. At the same time, their work is the outcome of the instruction these students have received in the School, and in this sense it is the result of that spirit of co-operation between professor and student which has been the principle of the School since its foundation. The teaching staff is not inclined to minimize the importance or the value of the instruction it gives, but it does not profess to create journalists; it strives to provide competent training for those who have the native capacity and ambition to fit themselves for journalistic work. The articles here submitted are the test of the efficiency of the School training as well as of the ability of the writers, and are presented with due modesty as a measure of the success of both students and staff in fulfilling the high purposes with which the School was founded.

Mr. Hohenberg and his associates may well be proud of the volume they have produced. It reflects great credit on the Pulitzer School of Journalism.

BRUCE BLIVEN, at one time managing editor of the New York Globe, but now a member of the editorial staff of The New Republic, prints in the latter for June 29 an editorial headed "Boston's Civil War." It deals with the Sacco-Vanzetti case.

The only comment of immediate interest to the readers of this department, however, is what Mr. Bliven has to say about the treatment of the case by Boston newspapers:
